mitting ourselves to a course of action which may in its results be disastrous to the last degree. The city of New York possesses many advantages for commerce and manufactures over those of any city of the world, it is true; but still it cannot continue to prosper and grow, deprived of good local government. It is the duty of the State to see to it that it has this government. The State cannot shirk this duty, and it ought not to if it could. Rightly governed, New York city will be the pride of the State and the nation; misgoverned, it will become the fear and terror of both. What is the principal cause of the badness of the New York city government? Is it not attributive to the ignorance, degradation and vicious character of the majority of the voters? Will any attempted reform, therefore, which does not change the composition and character of the constituency be successful? If a spring be muddy, the water which flows from it will be muddy, no matter what arrangement of pipes or hydrants you may make. To meet the difficulty, it is proposed to throw the entire government of the city of New York upon the people who may chance to be for the time beng residents therein—entirely free from all restriction and control on the part of the State at large. If New York city can govern itself free from all control on the part of the State, why not follow out Fernando Wood's idea and make it a free city? Why not apply the rule to the wards and election districts, to the blocks and households, and to the individuals? The fact is, the primal source of power is the people of the commonwealth; the State made the counties, the towns, the cities and the villages, not to abdicate government to them, but for convenience. What municipal powers it gave, it can resume; and if they are not exercised prudently and for the public welfare, they should be resumed. Indeed, that mode of government which secures the greatest safety and protection, at the least cost of personal freedom and convenience, is the best; as for theories, the power to tax is an encroachment on personal freedom and involves the right to confiscate and destroy, that certainly is much more arbitrary and anti-republican than the government of cities by commission. The true political doctrine on this subject, it seems to me, has been well stated in these words: "Leave to the local community what concerns themselves alone, so long, and so long only, as they manage it well; but never leave to local communities what concerns others than themselves, and always reserve the right to resume the power which is abused. If the peace and order of the city of New York concerned only its own inhabitants, that might be a reason why, in framing a Constitution, the people of the whole State should delegate to it the power to preserve peace and order, subject to be resumed on failure to perform the duty; but so long as we have the stranger and sojourner within our gates, so long as we have property of every county of our State, of every State of our Union, and of every nation of the earth within our warehouses, and the ships of every maritime people at our wharves, the preservation of peace and order is a concern of the whole commonwealth, one and indivisible. The duty of preserving peace and order is not, in any constitutional or just sense, a county or city duty—the preservation of the public health does not belong to the city as a city, or to the county as such. As early as the second day of April, 1803, an act was passed by the Legislature to invest the mayor and common council of New York with certain powers in relation to the police and health of said city. The preamble to said act commences as follows: "Whereas, the general welfare of the State is connected with the safety and health of New York, which has been visited by destructive and epidemic disease, etc., therefore be it enacted, etc." That is a city office or duty which pertains to the affairs of the corporation called a city, and that is a county office or duty which pertains to the affairs of the quasi-corporation called a county. The city of New York is a piece of State territory; every right, privilege and emolument it possesses is the gift of the State—it has no inalienable right to govern itself ill or well, as it pleases, when set up against the people of the State, whose interest in its prosperity and good government is, in numerous instances, greater than that of the inhabitants of the city for the time being. The question is, therefore, properly asked, why is such a radical change proposed for the government of the city of New York at the present time? Does any thing in its past history justify it? Have any petitions been presented for it? Has there been any public call for it? If so, I am not aware of it. All the underwriters doing business in the city have remonstrated against the State surrendering control over the fire commission, as also each of the life insurance companies transacting business in the metropolitan district have presented a memorial praying that the powers and duties of the metropolitan board of health be not transferred from State to local authorities, and a remonstrance signed by many of the leading citizens of New York against the abolition of the police department have been presented to this body. Partisan clamor and prejudice is the only answer given to law, order and good government. One would suppose, hearing the outcry against what is claimed to be the unjust interference of Albany legislation, that government in the city of New York by officers appointed by the Governor or Legislature was of recent invention. A brief statement of the facts will show how erroneous this impression is. The charter to Nichol, the first English Governor who succeeded the Dutch authorities, placed the executive power of the city government in a mayor, five aldermen and a sheriff. Thomas Willett was the first mayor appointed by Nichol. He was a puritan who had left England in search of freedom, and came from Leyden to Plymouth, Massachusetts, whence Nichol brought him to New York and appointed him mayor. The first mayor under the State government of New York was James Duane, appointed by Governor George Clinton, with the concurrence of the council of revision. The mayors of New York continued to receive their appointment from the Governor and council until the Constitution of 1822, when the appointment of mayor was vested in the common council, where it remained until the act of March 3, 1834, vested the election of mayor in the people of the city, and at the first election held in pursuance of the said act in April of that year. Cornelius W. Lawrence was elected by a majority of 181 over Gulian C. Verplanck. In 1809 the federalists for the first time in ten years carried the State election, upon which result depended the appointment of mayor. De Witt Clinton was removed and Jacob Radcliff appointed in his stead. It will thus be perceived that for a period of nearly fifty years and during the time that the framers of our first Constitutions, State and national, were active in public life, and are presumed to have correct theories of State and local self-government, the mayors of the city of New York received their appointments from the Executive of the State at Albany, and this without any complaint on the part of the people of the city. What would now be thought of a proposition to have the mayor of the city of New York appointed by the Governor of the State? And still a comparison between the incumbents of the office appointed by the State and city authorities and those elected by the popular vote, would seem to favor and justify a return to the system—appointment system. In the list of State appointments will be found the names of De Witt Clinton, Richard Varick, Marinus Willett (grandson of Thomas Willett, the first mayor under English colonial rule), Cadwallader De Colden, and John Ferguson. Stephen Allen, Walter Bowne, William Paulding and Philip Hone were the chosen officials of the city government, while among those honored with the popular choice appear the names of Aaron Clark, Caleb S. Woodhull, C. G. Gunther and Fernando Wood, the latter having been thrice elected to the office and serving for the term of five years. Furthermore special legislation for the city of New York, under both colonial and State governments has, I might with truth say, been the rule, not the exception. Under the colonial rule from 1691 to 1774, laws were passed upon almost every conceivable subject specially applicable to the city of New York, such as regulating and prescribing the mode for the construction of buildings, wharves, docks, the opening of streets, and keeping the same in repair, compelling the inhabitants of each particular ward to make good its quota of taxes, restraining hawkers and peddlers within the colony from selling without license, and establishing rates to be charged for wharfage of ships and other vessels. Under the State government from 1788, laws of a similar character were from time to time enacted. Laws were also passed known as "compulsory inspection laws." The Governor was authorized and directed by such laws to appoint inspectors for the city of New York, of sole-leather, flax, flour and meal, beef and pork, fish, pot and pearl ashes, lumber, tobacco; in fact, for almost every domestic article of trade and commerce; the seller of the commodity being compelled to pay the fee for such inspection. The Governor was also authorized to appoint in the city of New York gaugers, measurers and weigh-masters, almost an army of appointees, all deriving their power from Albany, and living upon the trade and commerce of the metropolis. In 1835 an act was passed regulating the weighing of merchandise in the city of New York. By the first section it was provided that the Governor should nominate, and, with the consent of the Senate, appoint, a weigher-general and not less than twenty weighers of merchandise in the city of New York, who should hold their offices for two years from the date of their appointment and until others should be appointed in their stead. The weigher-general was to keep an office, to receive orders, to weigh merchandise, which was to be weighed by the weighers authorized to be appointed by the act. They were authorized to demand and receive fees for services for weighing certain specified articles, such as cotton, for twenty-five bales, 10 cents for each bale weighed; if over twenty-five bales, then 8 cents for each; tobacco, 25 cents for each hogshead; hempen yarn, teas, fish, rice, etc. In all some one hundred and fifty articles were mentioned in the act for weighing which a specific fee was authorized to be charged. Section 7 provided that, on all articles not enumerated in the act, the weigher should be entitled to demand and receive the sum of 2 cents for each hundred pounds he might weigh; such fees to be paid one-half by the purchaser, the other half by the seller. It was further provided that no person other than such as should be appointed weighers, in pursuance of the provisions of the act referred to, should weigh any merchandise within the city of New York, for hire, pay or reward, except such merchandise as was intended for the use or consumption of said city. Every violation of the provisions of the act made the offender liable to a penalty of $100 for each offense, to be recovered with the costs of suit by any person who might choose to sue for the same. The weigher-general was authorized to receive for his services and expenses five per cent of all the fees collected. This bill was passed by a vote of 19 to 7 in the Senate, and 78 to 22 in the House of Assembly, the Legislature being democratic by a large majority. William L. Marcy was Governor; John Tracy, Lieutenant-Governor; Azariah C. Flagg, Comptroller, and John A. Dix, Secretary of State. Reference might also be made to the various health laws, laws in relation to pilotage, laws regulating sales by auction, and providing for excise duties on sales of liquor—all applicable to the city of New York alone, and enacted previous to the Constitution of 1846. In the year 1834, an act was passed entitled "An act to provide for supplying the city of New York with pure and wholesome water." Section 1 provided that the Governor should nominate, and, with the consent of the Senate, should appoint, five persons, to be known as the water commissioners of the city of New York, who should be citizens and inhabitants of said city. It was made the duty of the said commissioners to examine and consider all matters relative to supplying the city of New York with a sufficient quantity of pure and wholesome water for the use of its inhabitants. They were authorized to employ engineers, surveyors and such other persons as in their opinion might be necessary to enable them to perform their duties under said act. They were also authorized to adopt such plan as, in their opinion, would be most advantageous for procuring such supply of water, and to make conditional contracts for carrying the same into effect. This law was passed by a democratic Legislature and approved by a democratic Governor. Such was the character of the legislation with reference to the city of New York, for a period of about seventy years prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1846. It will be perceived that during this long period the State not only governed the city of New York, but, it might with truth be said, through the compulsory inspection laws, enacted what its citizens should eat, drink, and wherewithal they should be clothed. I am not able to ascertain that during these many years of almost uninterrupted democratic rule in our State, that anathemas were daily thundered forth against the unjust, tyrannical and outrageous Albany legislation. The city under this legislation prospered in a most unexampled manner. It increased rapidly in wealth and population, and its citizens were contented and happy, relying upon the intelligence and patriotism of the people of the entire State to give them good laws and see that they were efficiently executed. Since the Constitution of 1846 there have been created a board of emigrant commissioners, police commissioners, Central Park commissioners, fire commissioners, health commissioners and harbor commissioners. Applying the rule heretofore stated, can it be said that the people of the State were unwarranted in authorizing these commissions—or, on the contrary, is it not true that the entire people of the State had such interest in the subject-matter of each as to justify State interference, nay, State control? The preamble to the act providing for the appointment of the harbor commissioners, which was passed March 30th, 1855, was in the following language:

"Whereas, it is represented to the Legislature that the harbor of New York has become much obstructed by the erection of piers, wharves and bulkheads, and by other causes, and that grants of rights to occupy land under its waters have been made, and are liable to be made, without sufficient information of the extent of the injury that may be inflicted by such occupation, by narrowing the channel and otherwise."

With the view, therefore, of obtaining the proper information to enable the Legislature to control such erections and prevent such injury, it was enacted that a board of commissioners, to be appointed by the Governor, be created, who should have power and whose duty it was to cause surveys of the harbor of New York city to be made, to ascertain the condition of the harbor, whether the navigation was obstructed and whether, in reference to the probable future commerce of New York, etc., any further extension of piers, wharves or bulkheads into the said harbor ought to be allowed and to what extent; to recommend to the Legislature exterior lines beyond which no permanent obstruction of any kind should be permitted to be made. Also to inquire and report upon the propriety of laying out on the East river a street on the permanent water line in the city of Brooklyn, to be called West street. The said commission were, until the further direction of the Legislature, authorized to restrain and stay all proceedings by virtue of any grant of land under the waters of said harbor theretofore made, and all permanent erections in or obstructions of the said waters, which in their judgment may interfere with or embarrass the establishment of such exterior lines as they should deem proper to recommend to the Legislature. They were further authorized to employ surveyors, agents, workmen and others necessary to the discharge of their duties. In pursuance of the provisions of this act, commissioners were appointed who I believe faithfully and satisfactorily discharged their duties, and without any complaint on the part of the people of the city, although the act, for the time being, took from the local authorities the control of their harbor and vested it in a board appointed by State authority. But why were these commissioners appointed by State authority? It was not that patronage might be placed in the hands of the Executive, or from any disposition on the part of the State authorities to take from the city its chartered or vested rights, or to interfere with its rights of local self-government; but it was because the people of the entire State outside of the city limits had an equal interest in preventing the harbor from being injured with those who chanced to be the inhabitants of the city. If I am wrong in my deductions the honorable member from Richmond (who was at the time the law was enacted a member of the State Senate, and to whose untiring exertions and perseverance we were indebted for its passage) can set me right. In my judgment, the citizens of New York should remember with honor and gratitude this commission, for through its instrumentality, I think, the harbor has been literally preserved from destruction. I would ask my friend from Richmond if he does not hold the same opinion? The acts and doings of this one commission should relieve the system of commissions of much of the obloquy and opprobrium which has of late been cast upon it. Local authority, though it possessed the power, did not, and I do not believe would under any circumstances have initiated the measures called for at the time to protect the port of New York from injury. Hence the appeal for State aid; and, as the State had a vital interest in the matter, the necessary legislation was granted and the harbor saved. As to the Central park, I perhaps could not do better than to cite a short article from the New York Evening News, under date Saturday, October 12, 1867:

"We all boast, and justly, of the unrivaled beauty of Central park. It is one of the few public institutions of the city that leaves hardly any thing to be desired in the matter of management. Central park is the greatest ornament of which the metropolis can boast, and all New Yorkers are alike loud in praise of its varied charms of lake and ramble and umbrageous shade and sparkling fountain. But, then, New York has other parks in the very heart of the city, and if as much relative care cannot be bestowed upon them as upon Central park, it might at least be expected that something would be done to preserve them from ruin. Of all these parks, that in Union square is the only one that is kept in even tolerable order; and even Union Square park has become the resort of the most questionable characters. The Battery park no longer deserves the name; the City Hall park is abandoned to loafers to such a degree that, according to recent complaints, a respectable woman can scarcely sit there, even in broad day-light, without being subjected to insult. The park in Washington square has long ago ceased to receive much care, the only evidence that the authorities wish to preserve it from the fate of becoming a mere common, being that a decayed looking individual walks his rounds there and politely requests people not to sit upon the grass. Tompkins Square park has long ago been numbered with the things of the past, so far as its use as a park is concerned. The parks in Madison and Stuyvesant squares are kept in tolerable order, as compared with the last mentioned ones, but still the fact stares us in the face that all the city parks are being allowed to fall into decay. The parks of the city, if kept in proper order, would become powerful instruments in promoting the physical and moral health of the people; but if abandoned to decay and allowed to become monopolized by loose and questionable characters, will become as powerful instruments of evil as they might be made of good. There was a rumor afloat last year that the city parks were about to be placed under the management of the Central park commissioners. This would be 'a consummation devoutly to be wished,' but there seems no prospect of it at present. The state of the city parks is a disgrace to the metropolis, and it is time that something were done to effect a change for the better."

This article I am warranted in asserting is but a reflex of the unanimous sentiment of the citizens of New York as to their parks. The police commission was created to take the place of a system which had ceased to protect the citizen from violence and secure his property from depredation. Since the board was established a police force has been organized in the metropolitan district which affords adequate protection to person and property, and reflects the highest degree of credit upon those who have discharged its duties. It is the duty of the sovereign power of the State to provide for the faithful execution of the laws, that every man may at all times find his security in them. The police force is the arm upon which in the centers of population the State must rely to repress crime and to arrest criminals, and the chief function of the police always is the enforcement of the criminal laws of the State. Thus, out of 61,888 arrests made by the New York police in 1863, only 1,414 were for violation of corporation ordinances, nearly all the rest being for violation of State laws. In the year 1865 a joint special committee of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts addressed the following inquiries to several citizens of the city of New York in relation to the working of the metropolitan police system. The following responses were made:

"NEW YORK, March 28, 1865.

"Hon. Robert C. Pitman:

"DEAR SIR: I have been familiar with the organization of the police department for many years and feel much pleasure in answering the two questions you have asked me.

"1. You inquire, 'how far has the system (of a metropolitan police) succeeded in its practical working in your city?' A. The system has worked admirably. Our force is not sufficiently numerous, but organized in a manner to give it great efficiency.

"2. What is the present state of local feeling in regard to it (the metropolitan police), especially among those at first disposed to view it with jealousy, as an innovation? A. I have no doubt that the local feeling is now decidedly and universally in favor of the system. The law creating it was at first considered and questioned as an infringement on our local rights. But such of our citizens as feel an interest in enforcing law and maintaining order are convinced that the present system of police is much superior to any that preceded it.

"Yours truly, JAMES T. BRADY."

"CITY AND COUNTY OF NEW YORK, DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
March 23, 1865.

"MY DEAR SIR: In this city the metropolitan police has become entirely popularized, and all local jealousy has subsided. By it all the suburbs of the city are consolidated, practically—harmony and good feeling promoted. As I have been connected with prosecutions here for more than twelve years, my experience is, perhaps, valuable in saying that since the system—while, of course, by aggregation of population, and by the rebellion sending scores of rascals northward from every southern city, and from St. Louis, Cincinnati, Baltimore, and Washington, where martial law irritates them, crime has apparently increased, so has the ratio of its detection.

"Very truly, etc., A. OAKEY HALL."

"NEW YORK, March 22, 1867.

"DEAR SIR: In reply to the first interrogatory, I should say that the practical working of the system has been highly satisfactory. I attribute this, in a great degree, to the fact that it has been removed from all political influence, by the Governor selecting four commissioners, equally from the two great political parties, and to the institution of a most efficient school of instruction. The members of the body are selected with reference to their capacity, mental and physical, and a finer or more efficient body of men acting as a police force I have never seen, either in this country or in any of the large cities of Europe, all of which, with the exception of St. Petersburg, Copenhagen, and Stockholm, I have visited. To their capacity, efficiency, energy and unflinching courage, the city is indebted for its preservation during the riot, and no similar body was probably ever subjected to a severer test than during the three days that preceded the arrival of efficient military aid. To the second question I answer, that, so far as my knowledge extends, it has, entirely.

"Respectfully yours,
"CHARLES P. DALY.

"Hon. Robert C. Pitman, Chairman, etc."

This hardly accords with the statement of the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend], that there was no efficient organization or preparatory action on the part of the police at the time of the July riots, in 1863.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—In every way the men acted during the riot as well as they possibly could; but I say that there was a want of foresight in relation to the impending riot, when it must have been plain to all but the most obtuse that there was trouble ahead.

Mr. HUTCHINS—With the permission of the Chair, I will ask the gentleman from Queens whether or not any disposition of the police had been made on the Saturday evening preceding the riot, in anticipation of it?

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I believe that, at the first attack, the head of the police department went on the ground in a carriage.

Mr. HUTCHINS—The head of the police department walked to the scene of the riot, but was brought off the ground in a carriage. When the riot broke out, he hastened to his post of duty; and, as the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] does not seem to know what occurred on that occasion, if gentlemen do not think I am trespassing too long upon their patience, I will read a statement which will give some idea of what did actually take place. Superintendent Kennedy, having perfected, so far as was then deemed necessary, every arrangement for the suppression of the riot, started, about 10 o'clock A. M., on a tour of personal inspection of the districts reported infected.

"Visiting Captain Speight and the Seventh avenue arsenal, and leaving directions for any emergency, he drove across town; noticing a fire at Third avenue and Forty-sixth street, he left his wagon and walked toward it. The superintendent was not in uniform, had no insignia of any kind, and was wholly unarmed. As he passed along Forty-sixth street he observed that every face was radiant with gratification, every person seemed to be highly pleased, no evidences were exhibited of a disposition to riot or to any mischievous conduct, when some one exclaimed, "There's Kennedy!" and in response to a query, "Which is him?" he was pointed out. He took no notice of this, but, on being pushed violently against by a returned soldier, wheeled round and demanded what that was for; received a violent blow in the face from one of the crowd suddenly gathering on him, which knocked him over and down an embankment some six feet high. This was the signal for the cowardly fury of the mob, and down they rushed for him; instantly regaining his feet, he put himself to his speed across lots, toward Forty-seventh street, and had gained on his yelling maniacal pursuers, had reached and ascended the embankment, but foes equally cowardly and brutal met him here; the attack and pursuit had been seen from the opposite embankment, and with cool malignity a crowd awaited his coming; he had just gained the top when a rush was made upon him and a powerful blow sent him headlong back again, at the very feet of his original assailants. He felt throughout that his safety was in keeping his feet, and instantly was he again upon them, but too late for another run for life. The mob, with its Forty-seventh street re-enforcement, closed upon him with yells of exultation, dealing upon him blows with fists and feet. One fellow, armed with a heavy club, made earnest and numerous efforts to dash his brains out, but the sup tendent having a careful eye to them, a quick one to the ruffian's movements, manag keep his head "well in hand," dodge his and all others aimed at that quarter, with wo ful dexterity. During this terrific struggle fifty blows on all parts of his body must been received. In the swaying about of the and its victim, they had moved toward Le ton avenue, and close to a wide mud hole; this a tremendous blow behind the ear sen superintendent headforemost with great viol here it was where his face, buried amid the and stones, received the terrible injuries rendered him unrecognizable. Then arc jubilant cheer, and the mob yelled 'Drown drown him!' But the superintendent p that a plucky, determined man has nine liv well as a cat. Marvelously enough, even n retained his consciousness, was once promptly on his feet, and exhibited a neat strategy and agility. The mud was too dee pond too wide for the villains to enter in o sue through; they were on the Forty-sixth side; the superintendent took in the situati a glance, and made straight across the po Lexington avenue again. This gave hi reaching the other side, an advantageous upon his pursuers, who had to chase aroun borders, and who, on seeing themselves thu generaled, came after him with redoubled and execrations. They were too late, ever."—

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Will the gentleman New York [Mr. Hutchins] inform me what reading.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I am reading from a count of the draft riots in the city of York.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—By whom.

Mr. HUTCHINS—A report made by the d ent officers to the commissioners.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Are you not reading the police commissioners' report?

Mr. HUTCHINS—I am reading—

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Are you not reading the report of the police commissioners? I that signed by the police commissioners?

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from [Mr. Schumaker] will please come to order.

Mr. VERPLANCK—The gentleman from York announced that he was going to prove the riots in New York in 1863 were a part o rebellion, and he is reading a pamphlet w seems to be pretty long. Now, it may be n sary to read "Greeley's American Conflict some other ponderous work in reply (laugh and I do not think this reading is in order.

The CHAIRMAN—The point of order i well taken.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I will not trouble gentl with further reading from this part of the re I have read so far in answer to the statem that have been made that if the police had prepared for the riot and had been early o ground, or if the mayor had gone there wit insignia of office at the beginning, the ri could have been dispersed.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HUTCHINS—I will not yield again. Now, to show the malignant spirit of the mob, I will refer to the murder of Colonel O'Brien, as gallant a man as ever lived, a man who had been in the war, a man of your own nationality, Mr. Chairman—one of the glorious Sixty-ninth regiment, a soldier of the Irish brigade. Those men were not beloved, sir, by other portions of their countrymen whose sympathies were on the side of the rebels, but their services to their country will not be forgotten:

"The murder of Colonel H. J. O'Brien by the mob, on the afternoon of Tuesday of riot week, was characterized by appalling barbarities. After the battle between the police, under Inspector Carpenter, in the Second avenue, and after the police had left, Colonel O'Brien, in command of two companies, Eleventh regiment New York volunteers, arrived at Thirty-fourth street and Second avenue. The rioters had re-assembled, a collision ensued, and the military opened fire. The mob dispersed, and Colonel O'Brien, leaving his command, walked up the avenue a short distance, entering a drug store. Returning to the street in a few moments, he was instantly surrounded by a vengeful and relentless crowd which had re-collected, at once knocked down, beaten and mutilated shockingly till insensible. He thus lay for upward of an hour, breathing heavily, and, on any movement, receiving kicks and stones. He was then taken by the heels, dragged around the street, and again left lying in it. For some four hours did he thus lie, subjected to infamous outrages, among them the occasional thrusting of a stick down his throat when gasping for breath. No one who did not seek to feed this brutality upon him was allowed to approach him. One man who sought to give him a drop of water was instantly set upon and barely escaped with his life. While still breathing he was taken into the yard of his own house, near the scene, and there the most revolting atrocities were perpetrated, underneath which the life, that had so tenaciously clung to him, fled. No one could have recognized his remains."

Now sir, in relation to the mode in which colored victims were treated. The animus of the rebellion was exhibited in those riots. Colonel O'Brien was murdered because he was a loyal officer of the Union army. The colored men were so grossly maltreated because they were loyal to the Union.

"William Henry Nichols (colored) resided at No. 147 East Twenty-eighth street. Mrs. Staats, his mother, was visiting him. On Wednesday, July 15th, at three o'clock, the house was attacked by a mob with showers of bricks and stones. In one of the rooms was a woman with a child but three days old. The rioters broke open the door with axes and rushed in. Nichols and his mother fled to the basement; in a few moments the babe referred to was dashed by the rioters from the upper window into the yard and instantly killed. The mob cut the water-pipes above, and the basement was being deluged; ten persons, mostly women and children, were there, and they fled to the yard; in attempting to climb the fence Mrs. Staats fell back from exhaustion; the rioters were instantly upon her; her son sprang to her rescue exclaiming, "save my mother, if you kill me." Two ruffians seized him, each taking hold of an arm, while a third, armed with a crowbar, calling upon them to hold his arms apart, deliberately struck him a savage blow upon the head, felling him like a bullock. He died in the New York hospital two days after."

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to read any more of these accounts of the barbarous outrages committed by that mob. I recur to these scenes merely to show how formidable and dangerous that outbreak was. If we had had at that time in the city of New York, a police under the control of a mayor like Fernando Wood, I tremble when I think what would have been the fate of the city and of the loyal population. Such an occasion may occur again. I hope that in the providence of God it never will; but if it should it is well for us to be prepared; it is well for us to take warning, and, having the light of the past to guide us, to see to it that so far as the city of New York is concerned, by no possibility, in any emergency that may arise, shall there be vested in any individual in that city so dangerous a power. Mr. Chairman, I will here for one moment, refer to the charge of Recorder Hoffman (the present mayor of the city) to the grand jury in New York, December 6, 1864:

"We have, said he, one of the most complete police forces in the world; a force that is approaching as near to perfection as ever can be attained in this city and county of ours. If those officers who are charged with the administration of public justice, and the jurors whose duty it is to examine patiently the cases which will be submitted to them, do their duty, the laws will be enforced to the terror of offenders, and to the protection of the community."

Mr. BERGEN—Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. HUTCHINS—I have not time; I wish to conclude my remarks before the recess.

The fire commission and the health commission were alike demanded at the time they were formed, by a united public sentiment, and both in their action, have justified the wisdom of those who originated and secured the passage of the acts calling them into existence. Formerly a fire was the signal of the gathering together of the turbulent, noisy and vicious elements of the city, intent upon thieving and plunder, under the guise of a fireman's hat and coat; while the engine houses were the resort, to a great extent, of young and vicious boys. This has all been changed, a quiet, orderly and effective force has taken its place, so quietly and actively discharging its duties that a fire is extinguished without the knowledge of people in the immediate vicinity. No good citizen, I am sure, would desire the present system to be abolished and a return to the old. The health commission has discharged its functions with courage and vigilance, for which I do not hesitate to say New York and Brooklyn, during the last season and this, were exempt from pestilence. All these commissions at the time of the passage of the act creating them were demanded by an overwhelming public opinion and municipal necessities to reform systems which had become so intolerable that they could not longer be endured. It is possible that many republicans have been led to suppose that it was bad political policy to legislate for New York at the State Capitol, as it exasperated the people of the city to roll up large democratic majorities. If the security of person and property was enhanced by such legislation, the republican party would hardly be excusable for allowing such a result to influence them to neglect making suitable provision for our metropolis. But I waive any extended argument on this point, for I am confident that every candid man upon an examination of the subject will perceive that there has been no diminution of the republican vote because of the passage of acts by the Legislature authorizing the establishment of commissions in the city of New York. The republican party at the first State election after its organization, in 1855, cast for its candidate for Secretary of State in the city of New York 6,678 votes, whereas the candidates opposed to the republican party received in the aggregate upward of 60,000 votes, the party at that time receiving about one-ninth of the vote of the city. At the next election, in 1856, Fremont, the republican candidate for President, received 17,771 votes in an aggregate vote of 80,000 in the city of New York. The following year (1857) Clapp, the republican candidate for Secretary of State received 13,415 votes in an aggregate of 60,000 votes polled. In this year the metropolitan police was created, and at the annual election in 1858 the republican vote was 21,622. At the session of the Legislature of 1865 the act was passed creating the board of fire commissioners in the city of New York, and at the next annual election the republican vote was 28,740 in an aggregate vote of 81,000, nearly twice the vote cast for Fremont in 1856, about the same number of votes being polled each year. These two commissions—the police and the fire—have created the special animadversion and ire of those who stoutly resist legislation at Albany affecting municipal interests. A statement of the facts must convince the most skeptical that the cause of the falling off of the republican vote at the elections of 1866 and 1867 in the city of New York and the democratic vote must be accounted for otherwise than by the passage of the acts creating the police and fire commissions. The management of public affairs has been for years the theme of severe criticism. It is always easy to declaim against official corruption, prodigality and misrule, but not so easy to demonstrate in what the enormities consist, or suggest a proper remedy. It should be remarked, however, that the charges of prodigality, improvidence and corruption are well nigh universal on this continent. Local affairs everywhere have been repeatedly criticised and city charters amended, while the evil has been but partially remedied. The great question which we are called upon to decide by the majority report of the committee is this: Would it be safe to fix the forms of municipal government in the fundamental law, thus, under any and all circumstances putting amelioration entirely out of the power of the Legislature? This it is proposed to do by the report we are considering. It would, by the fundamental law, place the mayor at the head of the police, fire commission, charities and corrections, health, and of the heads of all departments and officers charged with the administration of departments, with the power to appoint and remove at his pleasure; this too, for the term of three years. This is a power which has never been granted as yet in this country, and I hope it never will be but if it is to be, I trust it will be by legislative enactment, that if the abuses which I fear may spring therefrom should come to exist, that then the Legislature might grant relief therefrom by a repeal of the obnoxious law. A simple fact of history of recent date should make us cautious how we advance in the steps proposed by the report of the committee. In the winter of 1861, during those dark and troublesome times, before the rebellion had actually come to a head by open attack upon the government, Fernando Wood was mayor of the city of New York. Suppose at that time Mr. Wood had been possessed as mayor of the powers now proposed to be conferred upon the mayor for the time being? Who can tell what might not have been the evils which would have flowed therefrom to our city, State and nation? He would in such case have been at the head of an army of upward of two thousand policemen, besides having the control of all the administrative officers of the city. Possessed of these vast and unlimited powers, it cannot be denied that if he had chosen to have used them in behalf of the rebellion that the great moral and pecuniary support which our city, through its merchant princes, bankers and professional men, and in fact all classes, gave to the government on the outbreak of hostilities, would have been measurably if not wholly neutralized. What Mr. Wood would have done if he had had the power he, under his own signature at that time, told us. On the 24th of January, 1861, Robert Toombs sent to his honor Mayor Wood, from Milledgeville, Georgia, the following telegram:

"Is it true that any arms intended for and consigned to the State of Georgia have been seized by public authority in New York? Your answer is important to us and to New York. Answer at once."

Mr. Wood returned the following reply:

"Hon. Robert Toombs, Milledgeville, Georgia:

"In reply to your dispatch I regret to say that arms intended for and consigned to the State of Georgia have been seized by the police of this State, but that the city of New York should be made in no way responsible for the outrage. As mayor, I have no authority over the police. If I had the power, I should summarily punish the author of this illegal and unjustifiable seizure of private property."

Will you tell me in the light of past history whether you think it was fortunate or unfortunate that the police at that time was under the control of State authority instead of the mayor? Adopt the report of the committee, and you put it in the power of a bold, bad man in the future to do great and irremediable injury at a time and in a manner that you least expect. Take warning from the past in your deliberations for the future. The question, it seems to me, is this: is a city government to be framed, from time to time, to meet the growing demands and necessities of a rapidly increasing population, or must the people be made to accommodate themselves to the government of visionaries and theorists? When the administration of affairs drifts from the actual necessities of the community and is conformed to theories only, it fails to answer the actual purpose of government. Are we quite sure that we have as yet developed any theory upon which any one form of city government is infallible? We should not overlook the fact that our action is not to affect the State of New York alone. The principles we adopt will in all probability be adopted in other States. It is important to the success of republican principles everywhere that it should not be tied up by any theory whatever, or that there should be any article in its creed except the one that all power comes from the consent of the governed, and that all governments should be carried on through freely and frequently elected representatives. One writer, in giving his views upon this subject, very truly says that it must not be forgotten that the problem of municipal government is not how to secure life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness—for these things every citizen has looked and must always look to the State—but how to secure clean streets, pure water, and a good police at the lowest possible rate. Political questions, properly so called, no more come within the province of municipal government than within that of an insurance or bank corporation. Moreover, we have never acknowledged the right of localities to regulate their own concerns. The State has always reserved the right to interfere with them to almost any extent short of the abolition of local government. In a memorial addressed to this Convention, on the subject of the amendment of this Constitution, signed by a large number of the most influential and deserving citizens of New York, the statement is made that it is not the capitalist, the merchant, the banker, the honest laborer, and the largest tax payer in the city who are opposed to commissions, but the professed politician, the place and power seeker, the trader in contracts and jobs. Some few eminent, able and honest men may question this form of government, but the great mass of our responsible citizens uphold it and would be struck with terror if it were abolished. This statement I believe to be strictly correct. The only really thorough and efficient government, honestly and faithfully administered in the city of New York to-day, is that portion of the governmental function exercised through the agency of commissioners. It should be the desire of every good citizen to see them sustained and protected in the future. On the score of economy alone, I challenge investigation, and assert that it is the most economical government which the city of New York has or can have for the exercise of the functions and duties now devolved by law upon the various commissions in the city of New York. It is not to be denied but that more unity and a more effective administration in the city government is desirable, but how is this to be attained, certainly not in the manner proposed by the committee. If it is attained at all it must be by legislation. I repeat, the subject is entirely within the control of the Legislature. If, as is said, government by commission is anti-republican and unjust to the citizens of New York, then let the Legislature repeal the obnoxious laws and try some other mode of government, but do not so surround the subject with restrictions and limitations in the fundamental law that they can do nothing in the premises. A charter for our city might be framed under the existing constitutional provisions, combining unity, efficiency and economy. All the disjointed parts of the complex machinery of our present city government might be made to work as one harmonious whole. I am not aware that up to this time any charge of official delinquency has ever been made against a member of a commission. For such acts they may, on the petition of a citizen, be cited to appear and answer before a justice of the supreme court of the first judicial district, and for proper cause shown may be by him removed from office. Not only have I never heard of official delinquency charged upon any member of the commission, neither have I ever heard that any member was open to the charge of neglecting the discharge of the duty devolved upon him by law. I am under the impression that the loud complaint made in many instances, is not that the law remains upon the statute book a dead letter, unexecuted, but that it is enforced with too much energy and fearlessness. An article in the Constitution like that reported by the committee, prescribing inflexibly how public affairs in cities must be managed would be almost an unqualified evil. The Constitution of 1846, in my judgment, went too far. There is neither necessity nor justification for such an article. We desire to be governed by the wisdom which is derived from experience. Certainly the manner of the administration of the local city government, executive and administrative, for the last few years, would not justify its adoption. Besides all these considerations, it is geographically out of the question to govern New York by a mere municipal government. Tens of thousands of the persons doing business there, whose withdrawal would leave grass to grow in its streets, and guant poverty to stalk everywhere, live in Richmond, Kings, Queens and Westchester counties, as I have before stated. The appliances of a mere city government would not meet the case. The territory in which these persons reside must, for a variety of governmental purposes, be included with the city. Hence, the necessity of the legislation for the last ten years creating police and health commissions. All efforts to remove the government from the control of the popular will or to secure fidelity by some other expedient than direct accountability to the people, will in the end prove to be failures. If we are to live under republican government, let us have it conducted on republican principles, the most vital of which are the ability of the people to choose competent administrators of affairs, and the necessity of keeping officers responsible to the people by the frequency of elections. When the people understand that their will controls the government, and when they find that their unavoidable mistakes in choice can be speedily rectified at the next election, and when it is understood that errors in legislation can be remedied by legislation, in place of waiting twenty years for a constitutional amendment, we may then point to our State government as a specimen of American republicanism. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we are making a vital mistake in assuming the duty pertaining to legislation, not only in reference to the subject now under consideration, but others which have hitherto received a large share of our attention. We should adopt certain organic laws or principles. To go beyond this, and attempt in the fundamental law to legislate for all time to come, may, and probably would, be the source of unmitigated evils to the State. I hope the time may never come when the Empire State, through its representatives in legislative halls will be compelled by reason of hastily considered and unwise restrictions embodied in the fundamental law, to refuse necessary and just relief to any portion of its citizens in any part of the State. But if this should happen, then will the hour have come when its proud standard should be lowered in the dust, and from its bright ensign should be obliterated that word of living light, "Excelsior," and in its place the words, Perditio tua ex te."

Mr. A. R. LAWRENCE—Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SCHUMAKER—I move that the committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Schumaker, and it was declared carried.

So the committee rose and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. CORBETT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the report of the standing Committee on Cities, had made some progress therein; but not having gone through therewith, had directed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on granting leave, and it was declared carried.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived the Convention took a recess till seven P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock, and again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Cities, Mr. CORBETT, of Onondaga, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the motion of Mr. Spencer to strike out the first section, Mr. Abraham R. Lawrence, Jr., of New York, having the floor.

Mr. A. R. LAWRENCE, Jr.—Mr. Chairman, I have hitherto refrained from taking any part in the debates of this Convention, and I have thus refrained for two reasons. In the first place, I was desirous that the proceedings of this body should be facilitated as far as possible, and that no unnecessary debate should be indulged in; and in the second place, it is always much more pleasant for me to listen to others than to engage in discussion myself. But the motion which is now before this committee, made by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], is one that so vitally affects the interests of my constituents—of those who have honored me with a seat in this Convention—that I deem that I should be recreant to my duty if I did not express the views which I entertain on this subject—if I did not lift up my voice against the wrong, which, should the motion prevail, will, in my opinion, be perpetrated upon the city of New York. Sir, I have lived in that city all my life. I was born there. I passed my childhood and my youth there. I was admitted to the practice of my profession there, and my professional life has principally been passed in taking care of and defending the interests of that city. And, Mr. Chairman, I am free to say that I never knew until I heard the speeches which have been made upon this floor how vicious and degraded a place it was in which I lived, nor that the inhabitants of the commercial metropolis of the United States were so utterly ignorant of the principles of republican government as to be unfit and incapable to manage their own affairs. Mr. Chairman, I did not come here for the purpose of instituting any odious comparisons betwen the city of New York and the rural districts. I am quite willing to accord to the rural districts and to the gentlemen who inhabit them, the same honesty of purpose, and the same sincerity of intention that I claim for myself. I am quite willing that they should differ with me, and that their constituents should differ with the constitutents that I represent, upon great governmental and constitutional questions. I do not think that in discussing the questions that come before this committee and which come before this Convention we should be guided by partisan or local prejudices or by political motives or considerations. It is my judgment that we should endeavor to discuss this question and all other questions calmly, sincerely and honestly, and to do that which is best for the interest of the whole State. Sir, I was very much grieved the other day when I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand]. He seemed to be of the impression that nothing good could come out of Nazareth—that nothing but evil could emanate from the city of New York. Probably at the time he made his remarks he did not recollect that the county which he represents owes its name to an old and respectable merchant of New York city, who for some time was Lieutenant-Governor of this State. My friend from Broome seemed to think that in the city of New York about three men out of five were bent upon the commission of some nefarious crime, and that if he went there his life would not be safe, that as he walked the streets of that city men would be lying in wait for him and ready to pounce upon him and destroy him. Sir, we have been told time and time again upon the floor of this Convention that our free government rests upon the knowledge and education of the people. We have also been told that men are not capable of exercising the right of self-government or of deciding upon political topics who do not understand the subjects which they discuss. It occurred to me when I heard the gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand] that he, judging him by this standard, was not competent to exercise the right of self-government or to make a Constitution affecting the city of New York because it was apparent to me that he was not familiar with the history of the city of New York, for the past four or five years or at any earlier period. It occurred to me that the gentleman from Broome, when he stated that the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] was in error in asserting that the average morality of the city of New York was equal to the average morality in the rural districts, did not understand that whereof he spoke. Sir, I wish to meet this question fairly and squarely. I do not hesitate to say and to put myself upon the record as saying that I do believe, as a man who has always lived in the city of New York, and who has had large opportunities of observing the rural districts, that the average morality of the city is equal to that of any portion of the State. But the gentleman said, sir, that we have a large foreign population in the city of New York, and that because of that element we were not capable of exercising the right of self-government. Sir, I claim to know that foreign population as well as he does, or as any man can do, and while I am willing to admit that among the foreign population, as well as among the native population, there are many men of depraved and debased minds, I affirm that the men of all classes in the city of New York, taking them on an average, are quite as honest, and quite as capable, and quite as industrious as the men in any other section of the State. I believe mankind to be about the same whether they are born in a northern or a southern clime. I do not believe that it makes the slightest difference in man's nature—that it makes the slightest difference in his capacity for self-government—whether he lives in a city or whether he lives in the country. And I say that my friend from Broome [Mr. Hand] was indulging in an unnecessary apprehension when he felt that in walking the streets of the city of New York, so large a portion of the population were plotting against his life. And when the gentleman stated that there were not five men in this Convention who believed the assertion made by the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] that the average morality of the city was equal to the average morality of the rural districts, I know that he was in error. I certainly wish, sir, to be enrolled among the five men to whom he alluded, and I have no doubt there are four more men in this Convention who would be willing to have their names added to make up that number. Now, sir, in respect to the foreign population of the city of New York, to which allusion has been made, if any argument is to be made in regard to that population, I think it is this—that men who are enterprising enough to leave their native clime, and who have studied enough to become familiar with the nature of our institutions, who are cognizant of the advantages of those institutions, and who have changed their places of residence to avail themselves of those advantages are capable of reflection upon the nature of government, and are sufficiently intelligent to become good and valuable citizens; that such men are capable of self-government and of living up to what my friend from Broome [Mr. Hand] calls the "genius of our institutions." Besides, these men from the old world do not become citizens of the United States at once; they do not obtain the rights and privileges attaching to citizenship until five years after they arrive in this country. They first have an ample opportunity for preparing themselves for citizenship, of becoming familiar with our laws, and of studying the institutions of the country and the principles upon which our government rests. The great principle of government in this State, and the great principle of the government in the United States, is that local communities should, as far as possible, attend to local affairs. You have affirmed and re-affirmed that principle in this committee; you have affirmed and re-affirmed it in this Convention, and you have adopted a report embodying that principle in reference to towns, counties and villages. Now, why make a distinction between the case of cities and that of towns or counties? Is it because the cities have a greater population? It does seem to me that the argument to be deduced from that fact is all in favor of the cities, because the inhabitants of cities have more frequent opportunities for discussing public affairs and more frequent occasions to debate, probe and sift all questions of public interest. Sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] remarked to-day that he came here to state facts. I propose to do the same. I do not wish to generalize or to philosophize upon this subject. That has been done by older and abler members of the Convention than I am. It has been done by men who belonged to the last Convention, and who know the reasons which guided the gentlemen who framed the Constitution of 1846 in the preparation of that instrument. I will appeal to facts. I will refer to facts to substantiate every position which I may take. Mr. Chairman, when we get up here to discuss this question—the question of the capacity of New York city to govern itself—the first thing we are met with as an argument to show that the people of the city of New York are incapable of self-government is the fact of the existence of the great metropolitan police. If you venture to suggest that the police system may be wrong in theory, our opponents say, "here is this metropolitan police." If you venture to suggest that the law which organized that police is contrary to the principles of our Constitution, it is said, "here is this great metropolitan police." Sir, if we were to believe all that gentlemen say and all that gentlemen have uttered, there is but one good thing in the southern district of this State, and that is the metropolitan police. Now, sir, I wish to take that bull by the horns. As I said at the outset of my remarks, I have lived all my life in the city of New York, and I think I am quite conversant with the old police system which prevailed there prior to the organization of the metropolitan police system. Sir, I do not hesitate to say that the police system which prevailed under the act passed by the Legislature in 1853, which conferred upon the mayor, recorder and city judge—local authorities, all elected by the people—the right of selecting and appointing the police, was quite as good, quite as efficient and quite as capable as the one which now exists in the metropolitan police district to-day. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that for a year or so after the metropolitan police law had been passed, and after the police had been organized under it, there was some improvement on the old system, but it was an improvement which was to be accounted for upon the maxim, "that a new broom always sweeps clean." But, sir, the corrupt influences which had been at work in the old police department have entered into the new system, and any candid man, comparing the two systems, would after reflection determine and decide that the new was no improvement upon the old. My friend from New York [Mr. Hutchins] was troubled with a great bugbear in the person of a gentleman who was mayor of the city at the time the old police system was in operation; and he stated that, although the power of appointing the old police under the act of 1853 was vested in three commissioners, yet the power was substantially exercised by that mayor. I deny it. I do assert that the recorder of the city of New York, who at that time was one of the police commissioners, did exercise the power and the privilege of appointment conferred upon him, regardless of the wishes of the mayor. And I do further assert that when that mayor was a candidate for re-election, the recorder, his fellow police commissioner, took the stump against him and opposed him with all his energy and eloquence. I well remember the recorder's speech at a meeting held in front of the Merchants' Exchange, in 1857, in which he vehemently advocated the election of the candidate opposed to the then present mayor. Mr. Chairman, I maintain that the doctrine which has been asserted in this debate, that because a man who has rendered himself obnoxious to the people of the city of New York has filled the office of mayor, that therefore the fundamental principles of state, municipal and local government should be subverted, and every municipal right and privilege should be trampled upon and abrogated, is unjust, unfair and without palliation or excuse. Sir, in the work in which we are engaged, we are laboring not for this generation alone, but for generations yet to come. The persons to whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] has alluded, and who, in his opinion, have exercised so baneful an influence upon the city of New York, are passing away and soon will have passed away forever. Their influence cannot be felt for more than a few years longer. But the Constitution which we are to frame will, if adopted by the people, remain for many years the fundamental law of the State—certainly for one generation, and perhaps for many generations. Therefore, we should avoid, in considering the provisions of that instrument, the mere passing influences of the hour. Such influences and present prejudices and passions should be forgotten. Now, sir, I have said that, in discussing this question, I should deal with facts. What are the facts? The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] says there are many thousands of arrests each year in the city of New York made by the police, and that such a fact demonstrates that the city cannot govern itself. All that I can say in regard to that statement is this: that the number of arrests neither show the efficiency of the police nor the inability of the city to govern itself. Arrests may be made, and in my heart I believe that they are frequently made, from malicious and improper motives. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] also asserted that in our City Hall park it was almost impossible for a respectable woman to take a seat during the day time, because she was liable to injury and insult. Sir, I pass through that park every day, and I did not know that such a state of things existed; but if such is the fact, it merely shows that the great metropolitan police, which the gentleman has made the text of his discourse, is utterly incompetent to perform its duty, and that it ought to be abolished. If he states the facts correctly they simply show that the metropolitan police have not done and do not do their duty. But, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins], has referred us to the metropolitan police as an economical institution and it has been asserted, both here and elsewhere, that the economical administration of the police system, when compared with the expenditures of the city government proper furnishes an argument against the ability of the citizens of New York for self-government. I have the facts and figures on this subject and am perfectly willing to meet my friend on this point. The metropolitan police law was passed in the spring of 1857. The district which it created included the city and county of New York, the county of Kings, the county of Westchester, and the county of Richmond, but the figures which I shall present relate solely to the city of New York. In 1857 the expenditures for police in the city of New York were eight hundred and forty-one thousand and one hundred dollars ($841,100). In 1858, when the metropolitan police had been in existence one year, the expenses were nine hundred and eight thousand two hundred and ninety-eight dollars and sixty cents. In 1859, one year later, they had risen to one million, two hundred and twenty-nine thousand eight hundred and sixty-five dollars ($1,229,865). In 1860 they had risen still farther to one million, three hundred and fifty-nine thousand six hundred and twenty-five dollars ($1,359,625). In 1861 they had risen to one million six hundred and fifty thousand five hundred dollars ($1,650,500). I wish to say here that it will not do for gentlemen upon this floor to assert that the increase of expenditures was caused by the war, for the war at that time had not taken place. The fact is, that between the year 1857 and the year 1861, there had been an increase of eight hundred and nine thousand dollars ($809,000) in the expenditures for the maintenance of the police of the city of New York. And yet there are gentlemen in this body who have the audacity and hardihood to tell us that the people of the city of New York are incapable of governing themselves, and who triumphantly point to the economical administration of the present police system as evidence of the truth of their assertion. Sir, the assertion is false in fact, as the statistics show which I have just submitted to the committee. But let us, Mr. Chairman, pursue this subject of the police a little farther; let us go on from the year 1862. When we do so we find the same increase in the expenditures for the police department. In 1862 the expenses of that department in New York city had risen to one million, seven hundred and thirty-eight thousand, seven hundred and twelve dollars ($1,738,712); in 1863

they had risen to one million seven hundred and forty-eight thousand three hundred and twenty dollars ($1,748,320); in 1864 they had risen to two million sixty-eight thousand four hundred and twenty dollars and sixty-seven cents ($2,068,420.67); in 1865 to two million two hundred and fourteen thousand five hundred and fifty-six dollars and fifty-six cents ($2,214,556.56); in 1866 to two million one hundred and seventy-three thousand seven hundred and eighty-four dollars and seventy cents ($2,173,784.70); in 1867 to two million six hundred and eight thousand five hundred and fifty-four dollars and ninety-nine cents ($2,608,554.99), being an aggregate increase of one million eight hundred thousand dollars ($1,800,000) in the space of ten years. Now, in the face of these facts, gentlemen come to the Convention and say that a commission is the panacea for all the evils under which the city of New York has suffered, and under which all the cities of the State are suffering. That the great remedy, which experience has shown to be effective, is a remedy which involves an increased expenditure of nearly two million dollars, in the space of ten years, in a single department of the government. If my friend from New York [Mr. Hutchins]—I call him my friend from New York, although he does not represent the city, but simply because he resides there, and was elected as a delegate at large to this Convention—if, I say, my friend from New York is satisfied with these figures, I as a representative of the fourth senatorial district, elected by the votes of the people of that district, do not admire them. My constituents, who are for the most part hard working and laboring men, do not like them. Now, sir, although the gentleman [Mr. Hutchins] undertook to explain away the great vote in the city of New York against his party, against the party of commissions, I do not think that he was particularly happy or felicitous in the explanation which he gave, or in the result to which his reasoning caused him to arrive. Sir, what is the truth about that vote? It is simply this: In 1856, one year before the metropolitan police law was passed and went into effect, the vote for the democratic candidate for President was 41,913; the vote for the two opposition candidates, Fillmore and Fremont, was 37,693, giving a clear majority to the democratic candidate of only 4,220 votes. Since that time the democratic majority has constantly increased. In the autumn of 1857 the majority for Mr. Tucker, the democratic candidate for Secretary of State, and who is now one of the delegates to this Convention, was 15,560. In 1866 the democratic candidate for Governor at that time, and now mayor of the city, received a majority of upward of 47,000 over his republican competitor, and last fall, ten years after the police law went into operation, our colleague, Homer A. Nelson, the democratic candidate for Secretary of State, received a majority in the city of fifty-nine thousand six hundred and sixty-six (59,666). Sir, these figures are significant. They mean something. What do they mean? For one, I believe that they mean this, that the people of the city of New York look upon the metropolitan police system as a system of taxation without representation. They look upon it as the old evil against which their ancestors fought years and years ago, and they are determined to continue to fight against this evil by public discussion through the press, and by all legitimate means, until their chartered rights have ceased to be invaded, and their privileges as a municipality are secured. And here, sir, I must be permitted to congratulate the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] upon the speech which he delivered the other day, in defense of the report of the majority of the Committee on Cities. I had never known that gentleman until it was my pleasure to meet him upon this floor; but when I listened to the speech to which I have referred, I felt assured that he had been reared under Michael Hoffman, that in his early youth he had imbibed the principles which that statesman had made the leading features of his political career; and I also felt pleased to see that my worthy friend could not forget in his maturer years the teachings and doctrines impressed upon his mind in his early life. Now, Mr. Chairman, ever since this Convention assembled we have been flooded with petitions and communications from the city of New York—petitions and communications which it has been pretended represented the wishes, the sentiments and the wants of the inhabitants of that city. Among these pretentious documents and communications which we have had presented to us, and which are intended to show that the people of the city of New York are not capable of self-government, are those from the so-called "Citizens' Association." I will not stop to inquire who compose this so-called "Citizens' Association." For aught I know the association may be composed of gentlemen of the highest respectability. But you will recollect that in the law we have a term by which we designate the fact that a name is incorrectly applied—I allude to the term "misnomer." So far as I can see from the elections which have taken place in the city of New York, the term "Citizens' Association" is a misnomer, when applied to our petitioners. That association have never had the courage to place a single candidate in the field for a general office, distinctively as the candidate of the association and run him as their candidate alone. They certainly are not a Citizens' Association because they do not represent the citizens of New York. I do not quarrel with them. They may be earnest workers in the path of duty, and earnest seekers for the truth; but I do say that when they come before this Convention and give out that they are the Citizens' Association, their name imports more than the facts will warrant. Now, in regard to this association, we have been told in one of their communications, in substance that the danger in the city of New York is from the too unrestricted use of the ballot-box! Here, Mr. Chairman is the whole trouble in this case. It is the old conflict between aristocracy and democracy. A conflict which engaged the generation gone by. The aristocrat has always contended that there is danger to the republic from a too unrestricted use to the ballot-box. My friend from New York [Mr. Hutchins] read to the Convention to-day an article from what he called a democratic newspaper. I do not know what the paper was, but, of course, it must have been a democratic newspaper, since he has said so. I propose to imitate his example, and, as appropriate in reference to this Citizens' Association, to read to you an article from a republican newspaper published in the city of New York called the Evening Post. A newspaper which demands and receives my hearty thanks for the able manner in which it has always contended for the right of the city of New York to govern itself and to administer and control its own affairs.

"The Citizens' Association have sent to the Convention a long plea for commissions, and against what they call the 'unrestricted use of the ballot-box,' which, they say, amongst other things, 'will pave the way to anarchy.' It is not quite fair to try to frighten the Convention by threats of anarchy, nor is it ingenuous to offer as a reason why the city is 'unfit to govern itself,' that 'this city is the grand entrepot into which Europe continually pours her thousands of depraved and criminal classes—they are here to-day the useful tools of worthless politicians who stop at nothing that will secure power.' The fact is that every man who comes here from abroad must live here at least five years before he can become a 'useful tool' of any kind of politicians, for he cannot vote until he is naturalized. And when we are told that 'the thousands and tens of thousands that came forth from the lanes, alleys, cellars and slums, and from dark holes and corners, in July, 1863, not only still exist, but have largely increased their numbers,' it is proper to ask who owns the 'cellars, slums, dark holes and corners' out of which these wretches crept? who makes twenty per cent per annum by renting vile fever nests, slums, cellars, and dark holes to the poor? When the rich and comfortable people of New York show some regard for the lives of the poor; when 'respectable' men and women cease to live in style on the rental of vile, dark poisonous tenement houses; when public opinion here makes it more disgraceful to own a pig-sty and rent it out for the accommodation of human beings, than to live in one; when there arises some sort of Christian sympathy between man and man here, then it may be time to blame the poor, the wretched, the criminal, for what they are. 'Let there be an intermingling of the powers of State and local government, as there is of State and local interests,' says the Citizens' Association. By all means; but not a muddle; not a doing by the State of what the city only can do well for itself. We are not afraid of the 'unrestricted use of the ballot-box,' because it is always to the interest and advantage of the people to have pure, just, economical government. They may make mistakes, but they will quickly correct them, for they feel the injurious effects of them. It is only when government is removed far away from those who are governed, that reforms become difficult, and people become careless of the general interest and hostile to the laws. We assert once more that the people have a right to govern; they have a right to misgovern if they choose; and no part of them has the right to step in with pretensions to finer morality or greater wisdom, and claim the right to govern the mass. Let the people misgovern; only keep the government near them; concentrate responsibility in the executive head, so that those who suffer may plainly see him whose inefficiency or corruption causes their suffering; separate distinctly the legislative from the executive; and give frequent elections, and the cure for all evils possible to government is certain and speedy. For thus, and thus only, the people can themselves cure the evils and punish the vices of their chosen voters; and this the people will surely do, for they are the sufferers from ill government."

But, sir, I have said that the facts do not bear gentlemen out in their assertions that the people of the city of New York are incapable of self-government, and in discussing that question I have referred to the metropolitan police. Now, conceding, sir, for the sake of argument, that all that is claimed for the metropolitan police is true, and that all that I have said in regard to it is not true, that fact does not affect the soundness of the conclusion which I have reached. Mr. Chairman, we have in the city of New York a bright and shining example of what the people of that city can do for themselves when permitted to manage their own affairs. We happen to have in the city of New York a system of public education which is superior to any similar system in the United States, and as nearly as can be ascertained, superior to any in the world. The Rev. Dr. Fraser, the commissioner appointed by the House of Commons, a year or so ago, to examine into our free school system, reported that, in all its essential features, it was the best in the world. I would ask these gentlemen who make a discrimination against the city of New York in the matter of local government, by whom is this splendid school system administered? Who have brought it to the perfection which it has attained? Is it administered by a commission appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, or elected by the two houses of the Legislature on joint ballot? Not at all. It is administered by a board of education, by local or ward school trustees and by inspectors. And how are these officers appointed? The board of education consists of twenty-one members. The city is divided into seven school-districts. Each of these school-districts has three commissioners, making twenty-one in all, constituting the board of education for the city and county of New York. All of these commissioners are elected by the people, by the people who, according to the Citizens' Association, are unworthy of an "unrestricted use" of the ballot-box—by the voters of New York, whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] has called to-day the "degraded voting population." These same voters also select the school trustees in the various wards of the city. The trustees exercise the immediate and, if I may so speak, the local control over the schools, while the board of education, as the central body, supervises and controls the whole system of free public education in the city. The remaining officers, the inspectors of common schools, are appointed by the mayor, who is himself elected by the people. The people elect the commissioners and school trustees in the same manner as they elect an alderman or a councilman, or a member of the Senate or Assembly. The same voters who elected the members of this Convention, Mr. Chairman, elect the school officers in the various wards and the commissioners of the various school-districts. Now, the point which I make in regard to this matter, the argument which I deduce from these facts, is this: that a people who are capable of electing school officers, competent to perfect such a school system—officers who have brought that system to its present symmetry and beauty—cannot be accused of being incompetent to govern themselves or to select any and all the public servants that they may require. The board of education of the city of New York at present expends a little more than the commissioners of the metropolitan police expend in the city of New York. Last year their expenses were greater, but they then expended about six hundred thousand dollars in procuring sites for school-houses. These school-houses belong to the city of New York. The title to the land on which they stand is vested in the city. And while I am on this point it is proper that I should state that the board of education, and the trustees of the various wards have under their control real estate amounting in value to several millions of dollars. Now, Mr. Chairman, this property is not lost to the city. As long as it is needed for educational purposes it is used for those purposes, and when not needed for the purposes of education it reverts to the city and it may be sold by the city and the proceeds arising from such sale deposited in the city treasury. These proceeds can be put in the general fund and used for the payment of the expenses of the city government. Now, Mr. Chairman, my friend from New York said that he should deal in facts. Are not the facts which I have presented plain and palpable? Do they not afford an argument stronger than any which mere language can present? Sir, they do, and it is an argument which no man can gainsay or refute. This school system of the city of New York was last winter subjected to the scrutiny of a committee of the Legislature. Certain gentlemen who sympathized with my friend [Mr. Hutchins] in his admiration of commissions, and whose thirst for official position was far greater than his, proposed to break up this school system and place it under the control of a board of commissioners appointed by the Governor and Senate. Well, last winter they came to the Legislature with their bill, and it was referred to the committee on colleges, in the Assembly. On that committee were the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. Archer] and the gentleman from Cortland [Mr. Ballard]. The board of education, after an argument before the committee, proposed that the committee should go down to New York and examine the schools themselves, and my friends from Wayne and Cortland, and other members of the committee, resolved to act upon the proposition. They did so; they investigated our system in its length and breadth, and after several days spent in the investigation they became satisfied that any intermeddling with the school system of the city of New York would result in injury and disaster not only to the city, but to the educational interests of the State. They determined that they would not destroy one of the noblest institutions in the State merely for the purpose of creating a commission, composed of men whose sole recommendation would be their partisan and political service. Gentlemen cannot get away with this fact, that if our people are competent to manage and control such a delicate and complete system as the system of public instruction, and are competent to select officers who are able to bring it to the perfection which it has attained, and to disburse honestly and faithfully the vast amounts of money requisite for purposes of education in the city, they are worthy to be intrusted with the election of their mayor, their aldermen, their councilmen and all their local officers. Let us now, sir, go a little further with this educational business. The history of common schools in this State furnishes us of the city of New York with another argument in reply to my friend from Broome [Mr. Hand], and also in reply to my friend from New York [Mr. Hutchins]. My friend from Broome, the other day, seemed to think that he and those who resided in the rural counties of this State stood upon a moral platform so exalted that we benighted citizens of New York might admire from the distance, but could neither approach nor attain. Now, sir, we are all in favor of free education. I heard here, on my return to this Convention last week, many speeches in favor of free education and the general educational system of the State, and no sane man can deny the blessings which have been derived from it. In 1849, three years after the adoption of the Constitution of 1846, a law was passed providing for free education in this State. That law, I am frank to say, having been submitted to the people, was ratified by a very large majority in all the counties of this State. I will also do justice to my friend from Broome, and will admit that his county gave a majority of 1,030 in favor of the new law. But, sir, I must also be permitted to say, in justice to my own city, that the city of New York gave a majority of 19,739 in its favor. The law went into operation, but it seems that there were some objections to it. Some people, I believe, did not like its details, and some others did not like the system of taxation which it engendered, nor the burdens which had to be borne in order to carry its provisions into effect. Therefore, the question was presented at the State election in 1850, whether the law of 1849 should be repealed? Sir, I wish gentlemen who have been so very active here in getting up slanders in regard to my native city and the various other cities of the State, to mark well the vote which was cast in 1850 in reference to this question, and to observe who were in favor of free education—who were in favor of the enlightenment of the people. Why, sir, the majority against the repeal of that law in the entire State was twenty-five thousand. How was it in the county of Broome? That enlightened county gave a majority of eleven hundred and seventy-five in favor of the repeal of the law of 1849. How stood the vote in the county of Albany, in which we are to-night, and which contains the capital of the State? The county of Albany gave a majority of five thousand two hundred and seventy-two against the repeal.

and so, all through the whole list of the counties you will find that it was the cities of the State which stepped in and prevented the subversion of our educational system. Let us look at this for a moment. In the county of Columbia, which contains the city of Hudson, there was a majority of one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight cast against repeal; in the county of Dutchess, containing the city of Poughkeepsie, there was a majority of three thousand nine hundred and twenty-three against repeal; in the county of Erie, containing the city of Buffalo, there was a majority of one thousand seven hundred and forty-three against repeal. In the county of Onondaga, which contains the city of Syracuse, there was a majority of one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six against repeal. In the county of Kinga, which contains the city of Brooklyn, there was a majority of ten thousand and seventy-six against repeal; and in the city and county of New York there was a majority of thirty-seven thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven against the repeal. Sir, I do not come here to create bad feeling, or to reflect upon any section of this State. I look upon every gentleman upon this floor as my equal, and upon his constituents as the equals of my constituents. But, sir, I never shall submit to sit here in silence and have a badge of indignity or humiliation placed upon me because I hail from a city. I never will allow that those constituents whom I represent upon this floor are not, in every respect, the equals of every constituency which is represented here; aye, even of the constituents of my moral friend from Broome, Sir, I contend that the facts and figures which I have presented tell their own story. They show that those hard working sons of toil who compose the masses in the city of New York and the other cities in this State, when a question of importance is presented to them, know how to vote upon it intelligently and understandingly. These facts and figures show that the people in the cities do vote upon such a question quite as intelligently and quite as understandingly as those who reside in any section of this State. I claim no more for my constituents, and shall be satisfied with no less. As I said when I commenced my remarks, I have hitherto refrained from taking part in the debates of this Convention. All through last summer I was tempted to do so because day after day I heard the same slander, in one shape and another, uttered against the city of New York particularly, and in a measure against all the other cities. To-day we have been treated to the same style of eloquence by the gentleman from New York. Sir, it seems to be impossible for gentlemen on the other side of this question to make a speech here, without doing two things. First, they must indulge in a tirade against the people of the city of New York, and secondly, they must sing loud the praises of the metropolitan police. I do not propose for the present to pay attention to the abuse of the city, but will recur for a while to the police system, for the purpose of alluding to some matters which I omitted when I first mentioned this topic. To come back, then, to the metropolitan police system, I assert that, however beneficial it may have been when the statute creating it was first passed, it has since been diverted from the purposes for which it was designed. The original design of the police law was, that it should apply to matters of police alone. To what has it been perverted? I will tell you. You in the country have a right to elect your inspectors of election and your canvassers, to conduct and superintend your elections and to count the votes which you cast. We have no such right in the city of New York. You have the right, through the inspectors, to appoint your poll clerks. We have no such right. That right has been conferred, in the city of New York upon this police board, who appoint every inspector, canvasser and poll clerk, who officiate at our elections. Is that within the province of police system? Not at all; and when gentlemen say here, as my friend from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] said, that this police system was not intended as a political machine, I say that, whatever it may have been at the outset, it has been entirely diverted from the purposes for which it was originally designed. Sir, when we go to vote in the great city of New York, we find our poll clerks, our inspectors and our district canvassers, appointed by this body, superintending our elections. Appointed by this commission which is not appointed or controlled by the people of the city; a commission, however, which the people are taxed roundly to support. We also find two or three policemen at the door of each polling place to back up the mandates of the inspectors, these policemen being also appointed by the metropolitan police board. That is not right; the power to make such appointments is clearly not a police power, and I was glad to see the other day that some gentleman in the Legislature was so struck with the impropriety and injustice of this thing that he introduced a bill to take away from this police board the power to appoint inspectors or canvassers. Sir, you have the right in the smallest town or the smallest village in the State, which is denied to the largest and noblest city on this continent. We have in New York city about two hundred and seventy-five election districts, and the board of police commissioners appoint all the canvassers, inspectors and poll clerks required in each of these districts. Furthermore the board has the appointment of all the boards of registration in the city. So that the case may be summed up thus. If you intend to vote you must go in person several days before election before a board of registers appointed by the police commissioners and register your name; after you have done that you hand your ballot on election day to an inspector appointed by the same authority a police poll clerk records the fact that you have voted, and your ballots are canvassed by another officer emanating from the same source. Now, these are not police powers in any true sense of the terms, and a reflecting man can at once see how extensive is the influence which the management of the whole machinery of our elections confers upon this board and how shamefully this power can be abused by designing and unscrupulous men. Again, sir, the city of New York ever since the Dongan charter, which was granted in 1686, has had the right, through its mayor and other corporate authorities, to grant certain licenses to which have been attached certain fees. Those fees constituted a part of the revenues of the city, and ever since the year 1812 have been pledged for the payment of the interest on the city debt. They go into what is called the sinking fund. Now, a year or so ago, some of the same gentlemen who are so much struck with the beauty of this metropolitan police, and with the grand and beneficent workings of this system, went up to the Legislature, and had conferred upon the metropolitan police the power to grant all these licenses and to take all these fees, making no provision for the public creditor and no provision for the payment of the interest on the debt, thus striking at once at the faith of the city and breaking down its credit. But it is fair that I should say that this law was resisted by the corporate authorities of the city of New York in the courts at the suggestion of Mayor Hoffman, and the question went to the court of appeals, which tribunal determined that such a thing could not be done even by or in aid of the metropolitan police. The court determined that there was a boundary to the power of the Legislature, a limit, at which they must stop, and said, in substance—"You have reached that boundary—you have attained that limit." Now, sir, in reply to my friend from New York [Mr. Hutchins], who has been so eulogistic of the metropolitan police—of their efficiency and capacity—let me refer to the numerous robberies of United States securities which have taken place in New York within two years past. And, first, let me refer to the case of the robbery of the old gentleman, Mr. Rufus Lord, in Exchange place, who had $1,100,000 in United States securities taken from his office. No policeman has yet been able to find the thief, or, if found, he has not been brought to justice. An investigation was had and every effort was made, according to the newspapers, in order to ferret out the criminal, but he could not be found. I might also refer to the case which occurred but recently, just outside of Wall street, where a porter belonging to one of the banks was stopped by men who jumped out of a sleigh, robbed him of between two and three millions of dollars of checks, securities, drafts, etc., and then jumped into the sleigh and escaped. Of course there was the usual excitement in the newspapers about it. We had the usual large headings in "leaded" type, but the thieves were never caught. About two weeks ago, however, a boy stepped into the office of Superintendent Kennedy and put down an envelope on the desk of the superintendent and then left. Upon opening the envelope, it was found to contain the very securities of which this bank porter had been robbed. That boy had not been caught when I left the city. Now, there was a robbery of two or three millions of securities, committed in broad daylight and within almost jumping distance of Wall street, and yet no member of the police was at hand to prevent it. It is true that the securities could not have been converted by the thieves, but the fact that they were returned is not in the slightest degree to be credited to the police system, and it does seem to me to be a forcible commentary upon the defects of the system that the thieves have escaped unharmed. I undertake to say that, in my recollection, there never was such a glaring robbery perpetrated in the city of New York, which went undiscovered and unpunished either by the police or the criminal authorities. I am indebted to my friend from Kings [Mr. Schumaker] for a further list of some recent robberies in New York, the actors in which have hitherto escaped without detection, and will read it to the Convention.

These figures tell their own story. It is not necessary for me to argue or comment upon them. Now, my friend from New York to-day dealt very largely in statistics, or what he calls statistics, and in which, I think, he drew largely upon his imagination for his facts. He would have you believe that there were seventy thousand men doing business in the city of New York who resided in the suburbs. I suppose he meant voters, for he said that if these poor men who were compelled to move out of the city of New York were enabled to vote, the party now in the minority would be converted into the majority. But I will take him up just there and ask him, if his argument is good for any thing, how it happens that all the suburbs of the city of New York, both in New Jersey, Westchester and Long Island, give such tremendous democratic majorities? That is the only answer I wish to make to the remarks of my friend on that point. My friend [Mr. Hutchins] also undertook to show that the commissions had not been so expensive to the city of New York as had been asserted, and upon that point I also have the figures. The city and State taxes last year in the tax levy amounted to $21,899,000—call it $22,000,000 in round numbers. We have a State tax amounting to $2,920,149.50. We were taxed for the police $2,608,554.29. We paid to the State for school taxes $455,088.27. I will just state here that in addition to supporting our own school system, we paid to the State last year $455,088.27 for schools, and got back from it $247,441.58. We do the same every year. I suppose that some of that amount was appropriated to the schools in the county of Broome, but not having the figures before me, I cannot state the fact positively. That makes an aggregate of $5,983,792.76. Then, in addition to that, we have the commissioners of charities and corrections, for which was appropriated $1,165,000, and we have various other commissions. The Central Park commission cost $241,095; the market commission in the eighteenth ward, $8,000; the board of health, $99,876,47; the fire department commission cost $78,000—making an aggregate expenditure by commissions of $8,278,031.74.

Mr. DUGANNE—May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. A. R. LAWRENCE—Not one word. I did not ask any questions to-day of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins], and I shall imitate him in refusing to answer questions. Now, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] read, in a very sonorous voice, and with a great air of triumph, certain letters of citizens of New York in reference to that metropolitan police. Among them was one from the Hon. Charles P. Daly, another from Hon. John T. Hoffman, then recorder of the city and county of New York, and also one from the district attorney, Hon. A. Oakey Hall. Well, the only trouble about my friend's statement was just this: that at the time those letters were written, in 1864, the board of metropolitan police was composed of two democrats and two republicans, under a law which was passed under Governor Seymour's administration, and when the police was a non-partisan organization. The gentleman certainly reckoned very much upon our credulity in supposing that such letters would have any weight with this Convention as showing the character of the police at the present time. I will remind this Convention and the gentleman from New York that shortly after the act of 1864 was passed, the term of office of Mr. McMurray, one of the democratic members of the board of police commissioners, expired, and advantage was taken of that fact to appoint in his place a gentleman, who, although a very respectable citizen, is known certainly as being a very thorough partisan, and the result has been that since the expiration of Mr. McMurray's term the metropolitan police board has been a partisan board. Any thing, therefore, that Recorder Hoffman may have said in commendation of the police, or any thing that Judge Daly or Mr. Hall may have said in its commendation in 1864, is no argument in favor of the organization or discipline of the force at the present time. My friend from New York [Mr. Hutchins], in making his long list of charges against the city of New York and to prove its inability to govern itself, has alluded to certain charges which were preferred against Mr. Cornell, the late street commissioner. He referred, I think, to some work that was done on the Eighth avenue, the substance of the charge being that a larger number of cubic yards of excavation or filling had been charged for than had really been done. There, too, my friend drew upon the credulity of this Convention, for he knew, as I know, that in the city of New York the street commissioner in making out requisitions upon the comptroller to pay contractors has to take the sworn returns of the city surveyor on the work as his guide. The city surveyor is a man who is appointed with reference to his scientific knowledge, and who has sworn to perform the duties of his office faithfully; and when he sends a return to the street department with a statement that so many thousand yards of excavation have been made, or so many thousand yards of filling have been put, that is the guide by which the street commissioner is compelled to act. There must be confidence somewhere. My friend seemed to make a great point in reference to those charges against Mr. Cornell, and he enlarged upon them to a great extent. Sir, those charges, and the proceedings thereon, are a matter of history, and I will refer to them for the purpose of showing this Convention that there are two sides to the story, and that my friend in his ardor has only put the Convention in possession of a portion of the facts. I have some documents which I will take the liberty of reading to the Convention. But let me premise by stating that Mr. Cornell presented a full and square and flat denial to the charges which were made against him—an answer which in any court of justice would have been considered as conclusive, and which was regarded as conclusive among his friends. It is said, however, why did he resign? I will tell my friend why he resigned. Because a gentleman was appointed referee to take the testimony in whom neither Mr. Cornell nor his friends had as much confidence as the gentleman from New York seems to have. But after Mr. Cornell's resignation what did he do? An attempt was made by the Citizens' Association to have Mr. Cornell expelled from the Senate of the State, of which he was then a member. He addressed to the Senate a document which I hold in my hand, and which I will now read.

To The Honorable, the Senate of the State of New York: On the eleventh of October last I observed in the newspapers, a publication containing charges of official misconduct said to have been preferred against me, before his excellency, the Governor of this State, relating to my conduct as street commissioner of the city of New York. I published immediately a card stating that I had not yet received a copy of the charges, remarking "nevertheless I hold it to myself as well as to the responsible office I hold, to notice them so far as to assure the public that I am prepared when called upon to entirely refute every allegation or charge which has been made, or any other which malice can invent or suggest." The next day I was served with a copy of the charges. On the 13th of November following, I submitted to the Governor my answer, which I positively corroborated and verified by several official documents. This answer was a full and detailed refutation of every charge against me, and cannot, I think, be carefully read by any fair man without being considered a perfect vindication of my official proceedings. Such an estimate of it has been repeatedly expressed by intelligent and disinterested gentlemen. A copy of the answer is furnished herewith. The Governor, under a statute passed at the last session, appointed a commissioner to take testimony about the charges. The commissioner designated was a well known lawyer, recognized in local politics by the technical or partisan name of "city reformer," a member of the "association," preferring the charges, and one of their "board of legal advisers," who from his political association might fairly be presumed to entertain unfavorable feelings toward me. As the law under which he was to act has been so construed as to require that every question put must be taken down in writing, with the answer given, without any reference whatever to the established rules of evidence which prevail in all other proceedings, I did not feel that an investigation conducted in such a manner, before an unfavorable officer, would insure me a just method of either proving my innocence or protecting me against virulent assaults, founded on hearsay alone, or public rumor. My counsel, after mature reflection, advised me in view of these circumstances, that the tribunal as thus constituted, was neither fair nor just, and as my official term was about to expire, that I should resign my office—thus avoiding a partisan investigation and furnishing me the opportunity for vindication which I now seek. My resignation has been construed by the malicious or unreflecting as an indication of fear to meet the charges, or acknowledgment of inability to disprove them. This imputation does me great injustice. I was quite ready to undergo any ordeal however severe upon any legal or fair testimony, before any impartial tribunal, but was not willing to have the columns of the press filled day after day with attacks upon me, founded upon street rumors, or suspicions emanating from mercenary or political enemies. Adhering to my avowal on the 12th of October, that I court investigation, I beg leave to solicit one from your body, of which I have the honor to be a member. I respectfully entreat the appointment of a committee of the Senate with power to send for persons and papers, and armed with all authority requisite to probe to the utmost all my official conduct. I have entire confidence that my political opponents in the Senate will thus afford me a chance to vindicate my official character, and I rely upon their fairness when they come to judge of my conduct. If after a legal and just investigation thus conducted the Senate conclude I am unworthy a seat as a Senator, much as I would deplore being deprived of the honor and the associations which the position bestows, I will resign them all, consoling myself with the reflection which must sustain me under all circumstances, that I have as a public officer at all times conducted myself with honor and fidelity. I hope that this request may satisfy even the most virulent of those who rejoice in assaults upon both official and personal character, that I am quite prepared for any examination which may be made by upright gentlemen in reference to my public course.

CHARLES S. CORNELL,
Senator Fifth District.

Dated, NEW YORK, Dec. 31, 1866.

That document, if the chairman pleases, was laid before the Senate of the State, and it was referred to a committee consisting of the following gentlemen: Chas. J. Folger, Henry C. Murphy, Jas. Gibson, Richard Crowley and N. B. La Bau. On the 1st of February, 1867 that committee made a report, a few extracts from which I will also read. The committee having recited the fact of the presentation of this memorial by Mr. Cornell, and certain petitions which had been presented by the Citizens' Association of New York, go on to say:

"That shortly after the third day of January, 1867, the said Cornell called on the chairman of the said committee, and desired an early day to be fixed for the commencement of an investigation of the charges referred to in the said memorial, and in the said petitions; that no day was fixed for that purpose, nor could be, for the reason that no one of the signers to the said petitions had appeared before your committee, nor had any one in their behalf, to name to your committee the witnesses in support of the said charges, nor in any way to enter upon the investigation thereof.

"That the said Cornell shortly after this again called upon the chairman of your committee, and again requested a day to be fixed for a meeting of the committee for the commencement of the said investigation.

"That the chairman then waited upon the member of your body from whom had come the said petition first presented to your body and referred to your committee, and sought to learn from him, who represented the signers to the said petition, and was informed that a resident of New York city, whose name was given, and who was understood to be a member and officer of the said Citizens' Association, would soon be at the Capitol, and would probably appear before the committee in reference to the said charges.

"That afterward the said officer, and another officer of the said Citizens' Association did meet with three of your committee, and were asked if they desired to be heard before your committee upon the said charges, and were informed, during the course of the conversation in relation thereto, that your committee would give all the time and attention necessary to the complete hearing and investigation of the said charges, and would go (the whole or some of it) to New York city, if need be, to forward the same.

"That it was then stated to the said members of your committee that the Citizens' Association was not responsible for the said petitions, and was not the prosecutor of the allegations and prayer thereof; and that it was the point of those petitions that the said Cornell, having been formally charged to the Governor with official misconduct, fraudulent abuse of power, malfeasance and malversation in office, as street commissioner of the city of New York, and that he having foiled an investigation into the truth of said charges by resigning said office, had thereby impliedly admitted the truth of said charges, and should therefore be removed from his office of Senator of the State.

"That the said members of your committee could not assent to such a proposition, deeming that to prove guilt or culpability of so high a grade as to be worthy of expulsion from representative office, there must be affirmative evidance, and they informed the said officers of the Citizens' Association of an hour the next day when the committee would be in regular session, and when the matter of those charges could be formally entered upon.

"That the members of your committee understood that the said officers of the Citizens' Association were to consult as to the course they would pursue, and whether the Citizens' Association would undertake to substantiate the charges referred to in the said memorial and in the said petitions.

"That at the said meeting of the committee, the said officers did not appear, owing, as the chairman of the committee afterward learned, to some misunderstanding in the matter.

"That it was then agreed that the said officers would return to New York city, and have there a consultation with other officers and members of the said association, and would soon inform your committee of the determination of the said Citizens' Association in the premises."

"It is scarcely necessary that your committee should say that no rule of law, no dictate of common sense, no principle of ordinary fairness, will permit that guilt or culpability should be assumed from an act which may be attributed to other motives than a guilty consciousness, and where guilt or culpability should be already and amply proven before action is had thereon, which will make infamous and subject to a degrading and notorious punishment.

"Your committee cannot think that the judgment of the Senate will sustain the position that the resignation by Mr. Cornell of his office of street commissioner is, in legal contemplation, a confession of guilt, or that it will justify or even give color of excuse to the Senate for inflicting upon him the punishment and disgrace, and upon his constituents the inconvenience of his expulsion from his seat.

"It is proper also to say that he has been, to all seeming, at all times since the reference to this committee, ready for the investigation, and has proffered the committee every facility of access to and the use of books and documents relating to the matters likely to be involved in the investigation.

"Your committee, therefore, report the following:

"Resolved, That the Standing Committee on Judiciary be, and it is hereby, discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Charles G. Cornell, and of the petitions asking for his expulsion from his seat as Senator from the fifth senatorial district.

"CHARLES J. FOLGER, Chairman.
"HENRY C. MURPHY,
"JAMES GIBSON,
"RICHARD CROWLEY,
"N. E. LA BAU."

"Dated February 1, 1867."

The committee were accordingly discharged.

Sir, that is the history of the matter, and it does seem to me that the judgment and decision of that committee and of the Senate should be received as a conclusive answer to the charges which have been made by the gentleman from New York. My friend also dilated at very great length upon a gas contract in the city of New York. Well, sir, when he was speaking of that gas contract his argument was directed, as I understood it, to show that we should not concentrate in the mayors of cities the whole executive powers of cities. It so happens that Mayor Hoffman, the mayor of New York, vetoed the resolutions which were passed by the common council of New York in reference to that gas contract; and how in the face of those facts my friend can perceive that his argument against this section is strengthened I cannot understand. Even the Citizens' Association, in their communication to this body, to which I have been alluding, dated 20th September, 1867 (whether my friend had seen this before he made his speech or not I do not know, but there is a remarkable similarity between the document and the speech), speaking in regard to this very matter say this:

"A resolution passed the common council directing the street commissioner to make a contract for twenty years for lighting our streets with coal gas. Mayor Hoffman vetoed this scheme; but it was only effectually stopped by an injunction."

But my friend alluded to another gas contract, in which he said the court of appeals had made some decision. In relation to that it is sufficient to say that there was a company—not the Manhattan company, but a company called the Harlem Gas company—which had some sort of a verbal contract for a year or two duration with the city of New York for lighting a portion of the upper part of the city with gas, and when the high times came on, the price of coal and fuel and the various materials which are required in production of gas increased, of course, as we all know. The company gave notice to the city that they would require a much higher price per lamp than had been paid theretofore. The city could not go to work and make them furnish their gas for a lower price than it was worth. The contract was out. They did the best they could, and instead of leaving the people all in darkness, they went on and had the streets lighted by the Harlem Gas company. The company sued the city of New York to recover the value of the gas they had furnished at the enhanced price; and the superior court of the city of New York, notwithstanding that the city interposed the objection that a contract involving a sum of more than $250 should be advertised under the charter, decided that that provision of the charter did not apply. They decided in favor of the company, and upon an appeal to the court of appeals the decision was sustained. My friend's argument involves the judiciary in the lower part of this State, and the court of appeals representing the whole of the State, in this fraud, if there was a fraud. I do not think that this Convention will be influenced by any such argument as that in deciding the motion now pending. It is, however, of a piece with many others that we have heard offered during this discussion. There was another gas-light company that had some trouble with the city. There are gentlemen upon this floor who are more accurately acquainted with the facts than I am. It is called the Metropolitan Gas company. Possibly some gentleman may enlighten the Convention on the subject before we are through with this debate. It seems to me, however, that the action of Mayor Hoffman in this case shows that the very best thing we can do is to put into the hands of the mayor the power which it is proposed to give him by the section, as reported by the majority of this committee. Now, I want to show this Convention what, according to the Citizens' Association, the mayor of the city of New York has done. There was a resolution passed, say the Citizens' Association—I do not know any thing in regard to the facts, but we will assume for the argument that their statement is true—in regard to the Harlem Railroad company, giving to the company the whole of One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street.

"It was pushed through with such indecent haste (passing both boards the same day), that Mayor Hoffman, in his veto, if not in form yet in substance, strongly rebuked the common council for the extraordinary rapidity with which it was ready to sacrifice the interests of our people."

Digitized by Google

That was veto No. two, and it was vetoed by the city officer in whose hands it is so dangerous to locate this extreme power, according to the gentleman on the other side of the house. These are two of the pet subjects upon which the Citizens' Association and their emissaries and orators and advocates are engaged in writing and talking in the city of New York and throughout the State at large. How they can claim any particular glory or honor from the action of the mayor I do not know, but if they can, let it pass for what it is worth. We claim that if any thing was done to protect the corporation or the tax payers of the city, it was done by the mayor of the city in both cases. There was the matter also, about the Corporation Manual. That is referred to by the Citizens' Association as an evidence of great extravagance on the part of the common council of the city, and also as an evidence that the people of the city are utterly incapable of conducting their own affairs in the city of New York. But it also appears in the communication of the Citizens' Association that the manual business was stopped by the veto of the mayor, and assuming all that they state about the facts to be true, the statement only goes to show that the hands of the mayor should be strengthened in the manner indicated by the section, which we are now asked to strike out from the article under consideration. The Citizens' Association also allude to the leasing of certain rooms from Mr. Fernando Wood. I do not know whether I ought to say any thing about Mr. Wood, because he seems to be the great bug-bear of this Convention. He has been talked about again and again; and if you propose to do any thing in relation to the office of mayor in the way of increasing its power, gentlemen get up and say, "but suppose Fernando Wood should happen to be mayor. It is true, we are engaged here in forming a Constitution which may last twenty or fifty years; but suppose Fernando Wood should happen to be mayor." I do not know whether Mr. Wood is as good or as bad as he is represented by some people to be. But I do know this fact, that my friend [Mr. Hutchins] who addressed the Convention at such length this morning, when in want of an argument hauled out of his pocket a document which emanated from Mr. Fernando Wood, a document which contained one of his stump speeches in the last mayoralty canvass in the city of New York. So it seems, Mr. Wood can be used on either side, for or against a proposition. I do not propose to use him for either side; I will, however, say in reference to that lease that Mayor Hoffman has taken the most efficient measures to prevent any fraud from being perpetrated upon the citizens of New York, if any such was contemplated, and that the whole matter is now before the courts for adjustment. Then what is known as the Ann street job, is alluded to by the Citizens' Association. Who stopped that if it was not the mayor of the city? Was not his action in that matter made a point against him all through the late canvass, in which he was vindicated by the people of the city and re-elected by a larger majority that any other man ever received for the office of mayor. I do not see how an intelligent man can maintain that because Mr. Hoffman acted thus the Citizens' Association are entitled to all the glory, nor how these facts help the argument which is intended to show that the people of New York are incapable of self government. Indeed, the argument is all the other way. My friend from New York [Mr. Hutchins] referred to another thing upon which the changes have been rung in the city of New York ever since I was admitted to the bar, and that is quite a number of years ago. I refer to what is called the Fort Gansevoort job. Now, my friend was discussing matters, as I understood him—permit me to say here in all kindness—rather from a partisan point of view, when he alluded to that transaction. He seemed to be endeavoring to create the impression that the dominant party in New York now, were responsible for that matter. I will refer to the case as reported (23 N. Y. R., p. 318) for the purpose of showing who were interested in the contract and also to show that they were not democratic politicians. I make no charge against the integrity or honesty of any individual who was concerned in it, for I claim to know nothing about that. The case is thus stated in the report. "This action was brought to obtain a judgment of the court declaring void and setting aside a conveyance made by the corporation of the city of New York under the common seal and the signatures of the mayor and the clerk of the common council, of a piece of land to be made, under the waters of the North river, and situated between Gansevoort street and Twelfth street, to the defendant, Joseph B. Varnum, and which he had conveyed to the defendant Coleman. The city was the owner of the adjacent uplands, which gave it and its grantee the right to sink bulkheads and make dry land of that which was under water. Simeon Draper was made a defendant on the allegation that he was influential in procuring the conveyance and was interested in the purchase; and that, being one of the governors of the almshouse, he was prohibited by law from being a party in interest to a purchase of any of the property of the city. The plaintiff averred that he was a resident and tax payer of the city of New York, owning real and personal property situated therein, and paying taxes thereon, and also that as the holder and owner of a portion of the city stock, he was creditor of the city to the amount of more than one hundred dollars ($100,) which debt was payable with annual interest. Now, in relation to this matter, I say this—keeping in mind the fact that my learned friend discussed this question from a partisan and political standpoint—that the gentlemen mentioned in that case were at that time very prominent members of the whig party, and subsequently of the party with which the gentleman is now connected; and if my recollection is not at fault the gentleman who was mayor of the city at the time these proceedings took place in 1852, was also a member of the same political party. Sir, if gentlemen will drag these things into this discussion for heaven's sake let them stick to the record. My friend says that the learned chairman of the Committee on Cities proposes to go back to a system which we have tried and which has been found wanting.

At the outset of my remarks I took occasion to allude to the former organization of the police. I only refer to it now because it comes in line with many other things which he said, that I jotted down, and also for the purpose of reiterating that which I said before, that the gentlemen who composed for the most part the police board under the old system were quite as competent to select a good police force as those who are now in power. Therefore, I deny that we propose to go back to a system which has been tried and found wanting. We propose to go back to a system which is quite as good as that which now prevails in the city, and confers upon the people of the city of New York the right which every other county of the State has. The gentleman from New York also referred to some remarks that fell from the gentleman from Richmond county [Mr. E. Brooks] the other day, in reference to this metropolitan police law. The gentleman from Richmond was not in his seat when my friend was speaking, but I see that he is now here, and as I know that he is abundantly able to defend himself, I will pass that matter. But, Mr. Chairman, the whole argument of the gentleman from New York was summed up in this sentence. He said that "the trouble in the city of New York sprang from the degradation of the voters." Mr. Chairman, there is the difference between us —the whole trouble in this case. We who are supporting the report of the majority of the committee are fighting upon the floor of this Convention the same battle that has been fought in this country for years. It is a battle between the aristocratic and the democratic element of the country. Gentlemen wish to take us back to the times which prevailed under the old colonial system. My place is with the democracy. I have no sympathy with gentlemen who proclaim the principles that my friend from New York and the Citizens' Association proclaims. I believe in the ability of the people to govern themselves. As I stated awhile ago, in reference to an unrestricted use of the ballot-box. I believe the freer we can make the ballot-box among the people of this State—I mean among the white people of this State [laughter]; I am on record in regard to that—I say among the white people of this State, the more opportunity we shall have for preserving and keeping a good government, and the more likely we shall be to protect and maintain our liberties and our rights. Sir, I have been very much surprised to see gentlemen who so eloquently and ably advocated upon this floor, the right of the negro to vote, get up, and ask that a clause should be inserted in the Constitution providing that an elector shall, as a prerequisite to his right to vote for State Senator, pay a tax on a certain amount of property. And I have also been surprised to see that my friend, the late mayor of New York [Mr. Opdyke]) in his minority report, has presented the same view. That minority report if adopted will impose a burden upon suffrage exceeding any thing which has ever existed under our city charters, whether granted under the colonial government or by the State. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] wishes to establish a property qualification much higher than that which prevailed under the Dongan and Montgomerie charters, for voters for the office of alderman in New York. If the city of New York is really suffering from the great evils which have been so eloquently depicted by gentlemen upon this floor, it does seem strange that the people of that city have not become aware of the fact, a fact in which they are more interested than all other sections of the State. Every attempt has been made to instruct them upon this point by gentlemen from the rural districts. They have been flooded with pamphlets. They have heard orations of able and eloquent men like my friend, and the whole machinery of elections has been placed in the hands of their antagonists. Every opportunity has been seized for the purpose of preventing them from voting, in the shape of registry laws, compelling every one to go personally and register his vote, and by obstructing the naturalized citizen in casting his ballot. And yet, year after year the majority in the city of New York keeps rolling up higher and higher. And here let me say that gentlemen are very much in error when they suppose that that immense vote in the city of New York only represents what the gentleman from New York calls "the degradation of the voters." Why, sir, it represents every class of citizens. It represents the wealthiest citizens, the mechanical classes and the laboring classes, who go to the polls, side by side, at every election and record their protest against the system of legislation which has prevailed for the last ten years, and which it is now proposed to incorporate into this Constitution. Sir, you will never lose any thing, the people of this State will never lose any thing, by trusting the people, either in the country or the city. I am perfectly willing to trust the people of the country, and I hope that you, when you look this thing all over, will be perfectly willing to trust the people of the city. My friend referred to several commissions—among others, the harbor commission—to show the blessings of the commission system. Because the harbor commission perhaps did some good work, is that any argument to show that another commission, created by the local authorities, would not have done the same? He referred to the Central Park commission. Of that my friend is, I think, a member, and it does not become me to say any thing in reply. As to the riots that he has spoken of, I have only to say that my reading of history teaches me that there have been riots all over the world, and probably will be to the end of time. I never heard that it was proposed to abolish the city of London because they had riots there under Lord George Gordon, nearly a century ago. Nor has it been proposed to abolish certain counties in this State because there were anti-rent riots there. Men will sometimes lose their reason and go to excess; but because they become temporarily excited and frenzied, and even violate the law, we should not disregard all the principles on which our government rests. A few more words, Mr. Chairman, and I will conclude. We have heard a great deal about taxation in the city of New York. I have here a tabular statement which shows the rate of taxation in the various cities of the State. I do not think the city of New York compares very unfavorably with the others. It appears that Rochester is the highest on the list, and that she is taxed six dollars on every one hundred. Oswego is the next—four dollars and eighty cents on every one hundred. Troy, four dollars and forty-seven cents; Syracuse, three dollars and seventy-two cents; Albany, Brooklyn, Schenectady and Poughkeepsie, nearly alike, averaging three dollars and fifty cents; New York and Hudson come the lowest on the list, Hudson being less than New York. One would suppose from the argument we have heard here for weeks and months, and which we heard all this morning, that the city of New York was taxed beyond endurance, yet the statutes show that compared with the other cities of the State, her taxes are moderate. In conclusion, I would remind the committee that the distinguishing feature of the city of New York, ever since it was founded, has been its cosmopolitan character. And I attribute its great increase in wealth, its great increase in population, to the fact that it has always retained its cosmopolitan character. If gentlemen will look at the history of the city of New York in colonial times, they will find the same characteristics on a smaller scale as those which now distinguish it. They will find a large foreign population always there. They will find a population different from that which had control of the other parts of the country. Sir, I contend that the system of municipal government under which the city of New York has increased in greatness, in wealth and prosperity, under which she has risen from a population of one thousand souls in the year 1696, to one million of souls in the year 1868, cannot be very imperfect. And why is it that in the space of the last ten years, for the first time, it has been discovered that this municipal system was all wrong; that the city of New York needed some exterior aid; that this municipal government, under which we have grown and increased in strength, was all a delusion and a snare? It is to be found in the fact that the people of that city do not agree in political sentiments with people in some other parts of the State. That is the solution of the whole problem. Sir, it is better for us to look that fact in the face and remember it, because politics change, and are changing all the while, and the political complexion of the State one year is no guide in determining its complexion the next year. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that nothing will be incorporated into this Constitution for merely political purposes or to secure the triumph of any political party. Such measures always recoil upon their inventors. But I do implore gentlemen to recollect that, as the city of New York is the heart and center of the commerce and of the wealth, not only of this State, but of the nation, that any wound inflicted upon free institutions and upon local government in her person will be felt to the remotest extremities of this State and of this Union.

Mr. BAKER—Before voting upon this question I desire to express to the Convention my views upon the section under consideration. By section 9 of article 8 of the present Constitution, it is provided that "it shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages, and to restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts and loaning their credit, so as to prevent abuses in assessments, and in contracting debt by such municipal corporations." That, I suppose, means among other things, that the Legislature is to provide what officers shall be vested with the power to govern within these corporations. After having done that the eighteenth section of the sixth article of the Constitution provides—I mean the present Constitution of 1846—that "all judicial officers of cities and villages, and all such judicial officers as may be created therein by law, shall be elected at such times and in such manner as the Legislature of the State may direct," thus vesting the right to elect in the people of the cities and villages, for although the word "people" is not used in the section, yet by fair implication the electors of the cities and villages are intended by the language used, and I believe the Legislature has never ventured during the Constitution of 1846 to put any other construction upon that section, by creating any other body of electors, for these officers than the body of electors at large, within the municipal corporations mentioned in the section; again it is provided in another section (section 2, article 10) of the present Constitution, relating to the mode of appointing the strictly municipal officers of the cities and villages in this State, as follows: "All city, town and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof, as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose." Now, hitherto, in construing that section of the Constitution, the Legislature have always deemed the elective power as vested in the electors of the city, town or village, in the electors of the municipal corporation. And the legislative construction put upon this section of the Constitution, always has been that the Legislature had no power, under that section, to provide for the appointment of city, town, or village officers, in any other mode, excepting by election or appointment by some power or body specified and designated by the Legislature in some act, and which power or body must be in such city, town, or village. Now, I take it that there cannot be any question that the Constitutional Convention of 1846 intended to express, and did express, in a direct and positive language, the duty of the Legislature to provide for the election, by the electors of the several municipal corporations of this State, of their city and village officers. And this construction was put upon the Constitution of 1846, by the Legislature prior, up to, and since 1857. But prior to that date, and if my memory serves me correctly, as early as 1855, and upon the election of Mr. Wood as mayor of the city of New York, upon an examination of the statutes then vesting in him and other officers of that city the power of appointing the police of that city, there were a large class of persons, as the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] has said, of all parties, of all classes of men, of every description, and I think he used the language, "every body," demanded that there should be some different mode or way devised of appointing police officers of New York city, from that prescribed by the statute as it then stood. Astute and ingenious lawyers were sent here to Albany, from New York, to devise some means of evading the intent of the Constitution of 1846 by enacting a law not in conflict with the literal import of the words of the Constitution, though in direct conflict with the intent of it, in respect to such municipal officers. One of these lawyers, eminent for his acuteness and astuteness, who frequented the Legislature of 1855, and was interested in this bill, was Mr. A. Oakey Hall. I well remember his approaches and plausible arguments to me and others to overcome our objections to his project. I had conscientious scruples against the mode of evasion proposed by him. I also doubted the policy of his scheme, even if it should prove a successful evasion of the Constitution of 1846, if it was to be accomplished in the manner pointed out and advised by Mr. Hall, and, if my recollection serves me, when the bill came up for the final vote in the Assembly, I voted against it, or did not vote at all. I may, possibly, be mistaken about that, but am quite sure I am not; but I know my convictions, as a lawyer and a legislator, as to putting this construction on this clause of the Constitution, were against Mr. Hall's mode of evading the section of the Constitution of 1846 which I have read. Now, up to this time, nobody had dreamed of a power existing anywhere out of the electors of cities to appoint or elect their municipal officers, the same as every town in the State. And in this report the majority of the Committee on Cities does not propose in any way to vest electors, the body of electors of cities, with any new power not heretofore enjoyed by them under the Constitution of 1846; it is simply a continuation of the power that was contemplated to be vested in them by the Constitution of 1846, and that the majority report vests in them. I do not see any thing new in the proposition of the report of the majority of the committee that is at all novel, experimental or dangerous; it leaves the power of election where it was before. Then, if this section which is proposed to be stricken out vests no new or dangerous power, I am at a loss to see any occasion for the alarm manifested by many delegates on this subject. I am at a loss to see any reason, and I have heard no reason assigned by any gentleman that has preceded me, why that power should be taken away from the electors of the cities and villages. The metropolitan police bill has its history, and it has been alluded to by several gentlemen who have preceded me. It had its origin in the hostility within the district of New York and Brooklyn against Mayor Wood. And that hostility was not confined to the republican party, to the American party, or to the old whig party. I think there was as bitter a hostility existing against Mr. Wood in a large portion of the democratic party within those cities, and in the American party, as there was in the republican party—a feeling as hostile, and as bitter, and more so, than ever existed against Mayor Wood in the republican ranks. The great majority, consisting of republicans in the Legislature of 1857, had but little acquaintance with Mayor Wood. They knew nothing of his personal character or his political career, hardly any thing except what came in the newspapers and by a kind of rumor or gossip from the city. And now I will take occasion to say, in answer to the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], upon whose motion we are now speaking, that I never understood the passage of the metropolitan police bill to be a party measure in the republican party. I never understood that it was instigated, devised or introduced as a partisan measure. There were men of all parties who came to this city, and, as lobbyists, argued for and urged the passage of that bill, because, as they alleged, they and the people had no faith in the police appointed by the mayor. And this scheme of evading the clear intent of the Constitution of 1846 was got up by New York lawyers and lobby politicians, and not by the body of republican members, who came from the center and western part of the State, mostly from the rural districts. The scheme was never devised by them, nor at the time deemed a matter of party policy, and when it came to its passage many gave their assent to it but reluctantly. If I gave my consent not to openly oppose it at all, it was against my convictions as to its constitutionality and expediency; and my impression and recollection now is, that I did not vote for it in any stage of its progress. It had its origin among a different class of men, and for a different intent from what has been charged by several gentlemen who have preceded me. But that bill having been passed and subjected to the ordeal of the criticism and judgment of the court of appeals, and having been sustained by that court as not directly contravening the section of the Constitution I have quoted, became the entering wedge of all these numerous commissions which have followed in rapid succession, and of which it was the prototype and pioneer. And upon its being sustained by the court, the other bills were successively introduced and passed, possibly with not as justifiable motives for their adoption. Now, it may be possible that some of these bills were passed designedly for political or partisan purposes; but I differ with the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris], and with the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], and also with the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], if I understand them correctly, in imputing to the Legislature a purely political and partisan or corrupt motive in passing those bills. Because I know that, although passed by republican votes, they were not all instigated, they were not all originated, by republican influence, but by individual men from all parties—especially the metropolitan police bill, as the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] has so frankly stated—who were anxious to get the appointment of the police out of the hands of Mayor Wood. It was said that the lives and the property of people within the cities of New York and Brooklyn were not safe, and the Legislature thought that if this was true, as represented by gentlemen of all parties from those cities, and there was no constitutional prohibition or impediment in the way of passing a law for the appointment of the police which would watch over and guard the property and lives of the people of those cities, it was their duty, in the exercise of their functions as law-makers, to provide such a mode of appointment. And, although it was generally understood by men of all parties that the metropolitan police bill was an evasion of the intent of the Constitution, as declared in section 2 of article 10 of that instrument, yet they submitted to it and voted for it for the purpose of protecting the lives and the property of the people within those cities. I confess, Mr. Chairman, I would not be so particular in detailing the history of this metropolitan police bill if gentlemen belonging to the democratic organizations and the American organizations, as it was on that day, would come forward and frankly acknowledge their participation in the passage of the metropolitan police bill. But when I know that gentlemen who rank themselves as first class democrats will go to Mozart and Tammany and there tell their hearers that these bills have been forced upon the people of New York and Brooklyn for the exclusive and sole purpose of domination over them, and solely by the republican legislature and the republican State government solely for party purposes, I choose to dissent from that view of the case, and I regard those gentlemen uncandid and ungenerous and deserve exposure whomsoever and wherever they may be. Let these gentlemen when they appear before and address their Tammany and Mozart organizations and auditors, confess their participation in the passage of these bills. So far as they have been instrumental in their passage —

Mr. VERPLANCK—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question. Did not the entire delegation from the city of New York vote against this bill? And was it not passed by a party vote? In looking over the vote in the Assembly I find no man I recognize as a republican, except Mr. Boies, of Erie, voting against the bill.

Mr. BAKER—I think that is so, but it was understood in the Legislature of that year that the members of Assembly and Senate of New York and Brooklyn were Wood men—they were all friendly to Mr. Wood; and he had control of the organization. But what I mean by democrats coming here, is responsible men from New York, not members of the Legislature, and whose names do not appear as legislators—men of property, of education, of character and standing, men of high social position. They came here and asked the Legislature to pass the metropolitan act and other acts appointing commissions in addition to the metropolitan police bill. It is that class of men who have privately favored the passage of these commission bills and publicly denounced their passage, that I desire to smoke out from their position—their secreted position. I ask them in all honesty, when they appear before their democratic audiences of Tammany or Mozart, to confess that they went to Albany and asked the republican legislature to pass this bill. If they will do that, I have not another word to say to, or against them. If they will as frankly confess as the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], and say that it was a mistake, that it has not worked as they then anticipated and hoped it would, and as we all hoped it would, I have no further complaint against them, but concede that men and parties have a right to change their opinions upon a change of circumstances, or upon knowledge acquired from experience of the inexpediency of the acts passed by their approval. I find no fault with gentlemen who exhibit that candor in this Convention or in the Legislature. Sir, I am opposed to the continuance of any of these commissions a solitary day beyond the shortest possible time required to repeal them. If I could by my vote, I would repeal every commission to-night. I cannot say but what it might, and it probably would, have a bad immediate result upon New York city. I cannot say that the city of New York would have as good a police as they now have; but I believe, as a republican, in the doctrine and in the principle of allowing the people, the voters, the power and right to appoint or elect their own local municipal officers. It is said by some gentlemen upon the republican side here that it would have a disastrous effect and influence upon the business and the prosperity of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and render life and property less safe than under the present system, but I cannot see it in that light. I would not voluntarily do anything to retard the progress of the great cities of New York or Brooklyn. I would do nothing to endanger the lives or the property of the people of those cities. But I believe in the capacity of the people for self-government, and if evils should arise I believe the people are competent to meet and overcome them, and establish as good a local system of government as those enjoyed by the other cities of the State. And it is upon that conviction that I intend to vote upon this article. I would go farther, beyond the repeal of the law. I would incorporate in the Constitution we are about to propose to the people a prohibitory clause against the Legislature creating or appointing new officers anywhere. I believe it is the province of a Constitution, and it is our duty as a Constitutional Convention, to specify and provide for the public officers necessary to administer the government in all the localities of the State; and I would prohibit the Legislature from increasing that number as to any important offices. To do that it would be necessary to incorporate something like the tenth section in this report, something in the phraseology or the words of that section. But I would reserve to the Legislature the power over the commissioners of emigration, because I deny that the citizens of New York and Brooklyn are exclusively and alone interested in the reception, passage though or distribution of emigrants from the city of New York. Every man in the State is interested in the emigration to this country. Emigrants arrive and land in the city of New York, but it is well known that a very small proportion of them remain there. They have friends and relatives scattered in every county in the State, and in every State in the great West; and upon their passage from New York westward they are frequently obliged, from their necessities, to call upon the public authorities of the different counties for their support and maintenance. And New York enjoys as ample security and indemnity against the necessity of supporting these paupers as Montgomery, Washington or Herkimer counties. The law provides an equal mode of protection for all the counties, and New York can properly claim no additional means of protecting herself against the pauperism arising from the necessities of these poor emigrants than any other county in the State, and hence I would reserve in the Constitution the power in the Legislature to appoint the commissioners of emigration in which every part of the State is equally interested with New York. I would also retain the power to legislate for the port of New York. The harbor of New York does not belong exclusively to the city of New York; it belongs to the State, and beyond that to the whole nation for commercial purposes, and beyond the corporate rights of the city of New York for purely municipal purposes, I would give them no power or jurisdiction over it except what was necessary for the execution of their municipal laws, but not in any way to interfere with the laws of the State regulating the State or national commerce. I would also reserve the power in the Legislature to appoint and control the quarantine or sanitary commissioners, because the people of the entire State, in the interior and especially along the great public thoroughfares, the Hudson river, the New York and Erie railroad, and every other thoroughfare of this State are equally interested with New York, are just as deeply interested in protecting themselves against disease, sickness, and epidemics as the people of New York and Brooklyn; and hence the Legislature should have control, and that control should be properly exercised by the passage of general laws applicable to New York and every other city and town in the State. I would also reserve the control of the public lands under water in the harbor and bay of New York which are owned by this State. Sir, some of my republican friends seem to be very much alarmed at the prospect of adopting in the Constitution a clause vesting all power in the cities to choose their own police officers. Now, I confess that I feel none of that alarm. Our attention has been called to the riots of 1863, and I feel constrained to differ with all gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject in respect to the efficiency or the power of the metropolitan police force in any of the cities to suppress or put down that riot. As the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] remarked in an early stage of the discussion of this question, it was a part and parcel of the invasion of the north by General Lee. It was a part of the programme planned by the rebels at Richmond and their sympathizers here, a necessary part without which General Lee did not expect to succeed in his invasion. It did not indicate the normal condition of the people in this State, or in any of its cities. Why, the riots, sir, in New York city were not exclusive to that city alone. They were not limited to Troy alone. I remember very well at the little town where I reside, we received hourly bulletins, half hourly, quarter hourly, every ten minutes even, the announcement of, "riot in Burlington," "riot in Boston," "riot in Springfield," "riot in Troy," "riot in Albany," and riots in almost every considerable little town from Albany all the way to Buffalo and even in the far West. These telegrams which reached us telling us that there were riots going on in all the cities and almost every village in the entire North were sent for the purpose of inciting riot and bloodshed, or why did they happen just at that particular period? They happened at that particular time, sir, because it was a part of the programme of the invasion by General Lee of the North, and no argument, no speechifying, no writing which any man can do or accomplish can ever blot or obliterate it out of the history of the country during those dark days of 1863, out of the history of the times. It is a fact patent to every body now, and it was to me at the time. My democratic friend from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] has had the candor to tell this Convention the truth frankly that it was a part of the programme of the invasion of General Lee, and hence—

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman allow me. I did not go quite so far as that. [Laughter.] I did not say it was a part of the programme of General Lee. I said it was an exceptional case. There were riots everywhere. My own village was disturbed. We were all excited there. It was the theme of the day, and riots were in every direction.

Mr. BAKER—I thank the gentleman, as he confirms what I have said. I did not intend to say that the gentleman represented that it was a part of General Lee's campaign, ordered by him; but it was the act of his confederates and sympathizers here at the North. That is what I intended to say. So now I have said what I intended to. [Laughter.] Now, to go a little back—and I am making these remarks more for my republican friends who have so eloquently depicted the evils and perils of these riots, than for my democratic friends in this Convention—I want to show them that there was no police force in the North (metropolitan or other) that could have put down those riots, which were a part of that rebellion in the North, as my friend from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] has called it a part of the invasion, I will try and satisfy him and my republican friends, if they will listen to me for a few moments, that that riot was so widely spread throughout the whole North, and so carefully prepared, that no police force within the State of New York, or in the world, as such, could have put it down. It was put down, however. And I will show you in a moment how it was put down by a better and a higher power than any city police—a power that I rely upon in preference to any police that can be appointed by the Legislature, or the mayor of any city, or elected by any people of any State. Early, sir, in the month of March—I think in the month of March—Mr. Vallandigham had been defeated as a candidate for Governor of the State of Ohio. He immediately returned to the State of Ohio and there commenced a series of meetings and a course of agitation against the federal government on account of its stringent measures to suppress the rebellion. He spoke against the government, and said they were illegally and unconstitutionally arresting people and putting them in prison, depriving them of the right of trial by jury, suspending the writ of habeas corpus, and told the people that these illegal, unconstitutional and aggressive acts on the part of the government might be lawfully resisted, and it was for such disloyal teachings and doctrines by Mr. Vallandigham, to the people of Ohio, that he was arrested. I think this was on or about the fourth of May, but not until after he had been admonished by an order of General Burnside, promulgated April 13th, 1863, that "all persons found within our lines who commit acts for the benefit of the enemies of our country, will be tried as spies or traitors, and if convicted will suffer death," and adding that "the habit of declaring sympathies for the enemy will not be allowed in this department; persons committing such offenses will be at once arrested with a view to being tried as above stated, or sent beyond our lines into the lines of their friends. It must be distinctly understood that treason, expressed or implied, will not be tolerated in this department." This was at the time when Morgan was about crossing over into the States of Ohio and Indiana, and Lee was coming over the Potomac into Maryland and Pennsylvania, about the commencement of the month of May. Mr. Vallandigham sued out a writ of habeas corpus, before Judge Leavitt, of the State of Ohio. The writ was dismissed after a full hearing by Judge Leavitt, with these comments; and I ask the indulgence of the Convention for one moment while I read the concluding remarks of this judge in denying the application of Mr. Vallandigham for the writ of habeas corpus, showing the estimation in which Judge Leavitt held the arrest of Mr. Vallandigham, and the causes of his subsequent conviction. In dismissing the application the judge remarks that "Men should know and lay the truth to heart, that there is a course of conduct not involving overt treason, and not therefore subject to punishment as such, which nevertheless implies moral guilt and a gross offense against the country. Those who live under the protection and enjoy the blessings of our benignant government must learn that they cannot stab its vitals with impunity. If they cherish hatred and hostility to it and desire its subversion, let them withdraw from its jurisdiction and seek the fellowship and protection of those with whom they are in sympathy. If they remain with us, while they are not of us, they must be subject to such a course of dealing as the great law of self-preservation prescribes and will enforce; and let them not complain if the stringent doctrine of military necessity should find them to be the legitimate subject of its action. I have no fear that the recognition of this doctrine will lead to an arbitrary invasion of the personal security or personal liberty of the citizen. It is rare, indeed, that a charge of disloyalty will be made on insufficient grounds; but if there should be an occasional mistake, such an occurrence is not to be put in competition with the preservation of the nation; and I confess I am but little moved by the eloquent appeals of those who, while they indignantly denounce violation of personal liberty, look with no horror upon a despotism as unmitigated as the world has ever witnessed." There, sir, is a graphic delineation and description of the conduct and character of the actions upon which Mr. Vallandigham was arrested, convicted, and sentenced to Fort Warren. He was convicted, I think, on the fifteenth of the month, and on the nineteenth of the same month Mr. Lincoln modified the order of the court which had tried Mr. Vallandigham, and allowed him to pass through our lines and go among his friends; providing, however, that in case he should return to disturb the peace of the people who were struggling to support and sustain their government, he should be confined in prison and kept there until the end of the rebellion. Now, sir, it was common doctrine at that time, among a certain class of men whose sympathies were with the rebellion, that the government was violating and destroying the personal rights of individuals, that the government was overthrowing the Constitution and all our civil rights secured by that instrument. Let me ask any gentleman, democrat or republican, whether if we believed that our government, national or State, was designedly effecting the overthrow of our rights under the Constitution, we would remain quiet, or whether we would not do as thousands of men felt it their duty to do, rise against the government in any mode or manner possible to defeat the completion of our ruin? But, sir, I come nearer home. These incidents and occurrences of which I have spoken, happened in the far West; in Ohio, in Illinois, and in Indiana, and some even beyond the Mississippi. In all that region of country these doctrines were taught by leading and influential men, the common people who were not constitutional lawyers or learned scholars, were told by their leaders that the government was overthrowing their rights and liberties by these arrests. Now, that we can look back upon the scenes of those days, is it at all strange that riots and resistance to the government occurred? To my mind, sir, it is a greater wonder that more such disturbances did not occur. However, I said I was coming nearer home. In this city, sir, a democratic convention composed of gentlemen of wealth, intelligence and character of this city and surrounding neighborhood, met soon after Mr. Vallandigham's sentence had been carried into effect by passing him into the rebel lines among his friends. That respectable and influential convention met in this city and here denounced the federal government and the President for the violation of the rights of the citizens in the arrest of Vallandigham; and I ask the indulgence of this Convention for a moment, while I read two or three of the resolutions that were passed by that convention. It passed a series of resolutions, among which I find the following. Having first set forth certain principles which they held and which we all held sacred, they proceeded to say:

"Resolved, That in view of the principles, we denounce the recent assumption of a military commander to seize and try a citizen of Ohio, Clement L. Vallandigham, for no other reason than words addressed to a public meeting in criticism of the course of the administration, and in condemnation of the military orders of that general.

"Resolved, that this assumption of power by a military tribunal, if successfully asserted, not only abrogates the rights of the people to assemble and discuss the affairs of government, the liberty of speech and of the press, the right of trial by jury, the law of evidence and the privilege of habeas corpus, but it strikes a fatal blow at the supremacy of law and the authority of the State and federal Constitutions."

And I find in another resolution a demand made of the head of our government in these words:

"Resolved, That in the election of Governor Seymour the people of this State, by an emphatic majority, declared their condemnation of the system of arbitrary arrests and their determination to stand by the Constitution; that the revival of this lawless system can have but one result, to divide and distract the North and destroy its confidence in the purposes of the administration; that we deprecate it as an element of confusion at home, weakness to our armies in the field, and as calculated to lower the estimate of American character and magnify the apparent peril of our cause abroad; and that, regarding the blow struck at a citizen of Ohio, as aimed at the rights of every citizen at the North, we denounce it as against the spirit of our laws and Constitution, and most earnestly call upon the President of the United States to reverse the action of the military tribunal which has passed a 'cruel and unusual punishment' upon the party arrested, prohibited in terms by the Constitution, and to restore him to the liberty of which he has been deprived."

Now, Mr. Chairman, of my friend from New York and of my friend from Troy, I would inquire, in the name of common sense, what would they expect from the mass of the common people, who make no pretense to wisdom, or to being constitutional lawyers, what would they expect from them under such circumstances, relying, as they naturally would, upon their leaders, gentlemen of high standing, who composed the officers and body of this meeting, promulgating to the people doctrines such as I have read from these democratic resolutions, that our national government, in its effort to overthrow the rebellion, was guilty of treason against the rights and liberties of the citizens? Would not such representations from their leaders necessarily and naturally exasperate the mass of the people and provoke them to riot, outrage and bloodshed? Remember, too, that this was just after President Lincoln had made a call for a large number of men to sustain our armies in the field. That was the time chosen, sir; and when in the midst of national disaster, delay and defeat, existing from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and spreading gloom and apprehension over the entire North, when our cause seemed almost hopeless to human eyes, we find a convention of respectable, wealthy and intelligent gentlemen sitting in the capital city of the State and promulgating these doctrines so hostile to the efforts of the government, was it not directly calculated, sir, to provoke riots and resistance to the general government?

Mr. DEVELIN—Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BAKER—I will yield for a question.

Mr. DEVELIN—That is all I ask the gentleman to yield for. I wish to inquire whether, when John Brown invaded Virginia at Harper's Ferry, he was not a leader of a mob?

Mr. BAKER—I am very glad the gentleman has called my attention to that event, and I will answer him now, that I have always held that John Brown was guilty of violating the laws of Virginia, but the man who procured the arrest of and had him declared guilty of treason was at that very time plotting against his country and conspiring for its overthrow. That man who took John Brown, gave him no time for a fair trial, no time for investigation or defense, and who was aided by the same Vallandigham who was there on the spot with Mr. Mason, and who, no doubt, was one of the conspirators that induced John Brown and his party to be there, in violation of the laws of Virginia, and sought to implicate with him William H. Seward and other prominent republicans—that man has the unblushing impudence to talk of the treason of John Brown.

Mr. DEVELIN—I did not say any thing about his treason.

Mr. BAKER—I do not refer to the honorable gentleman from New York. I speak of Henry A. Wise, of Virginia. He is the man that hung John Brown for alleged treason, when he himself was plotting the destruction of his country, although, as Governor of his State, he was under the obligation of an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. That was the man that hung John Brown for treason, after a mock trial of a wounded and dying man.

Mr. DEVELIN—If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him again for a moment, I will say that perhaps the finest criminal lawyer in the United States, certainly the finest in the State of New York, Mr. James T. Brady, has publicly expressed an opinion about that trial in which I perfectly concur: that the trial of John Brown at Harper's Ferry was an outrage upon all ideas of justice.

Mr. BAKER—That is an opinion in which I heartily concur, and I have a higher respect for Mr. Brady for expressing it.

Mr. DEVELIN—Then you will have a higher respect for me also, for I agree with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER—To come back, sir, from this digression, I have not enumerated all the causes which led to the riots of 1863. This same convention which met in the city of Albany promulgated a sort of proclamation in the form of resolutions declaratory of the rights of the people, and a letter was read on that occasion (I think and am quite sure it was on that occasion) from Governor Seymour, in which he admonished his friends that it was "time to pause" in their support of the government. When you undertake to condemn those poor, deluded, frenzied rioters, and before you inflict upon them the full measure of punishment that can be inflicted by public sentiment, I ask you to arraign before the bar of public opinion the men who caused those rioters to be there. Think for a moment of the Governor of this great State proclaiming that it was "time to pause" in the support of the government.

Mr. CHESEBRO—Does the gentleman mean to quote Governor Seymour as saying that?

Mr. BAKER—I do, as saying that substantially.

Mr. CHESEBRO—That is your construction of his language. He never said such a word in his life.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DEVELIN—Governor Seymour harangued the rioters in New York and addressed them as "my friends." Perhaps that is what the gentleman from Montgomery refers to.

Mr. BAKER—No, sir; I am speaking of a letter addressed to the Vallandigham meeting held in this city which I have already described, and of which the Hon. Mr. Corning was chairman. I may be mistaken as to the precise language of the letter, but as to the purport of it I cannot be mistaken. That letter is fresh in the recollection of the people of this State, and they will not soon forget it. Now, I ask gentlemen to contemplate the spectacle of the Governor of this State declaring to the people that it was "time to pause" in their support of the Federal government, and saying it at a time when, to all human eyes, our fortunes seemed darkest.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I am very sure that the gentleman from Montgomery is mistaken, because I have a very distinct recollection of the matter. I know very well that Governor Seymour wrote a letter to the Albany meeting, but in that letter he did not say that it was time to pause in support of the government. He did denounce the arrest of Mr. Vallandigham, and his trial before a military tribunal, as unconstitutional and tyrannical in which I agree with him.

Mr. BAKER—Will the gentleman from Onondaga, while he is up, explain the connection in which Governor Seymour did say that it was time to pause, and in respect to what?

Mr. COMSTOCK—I deny that he said it at all; he used no such expression.

Mr. BAKER—I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I say that expression was used by Governor Seymour; and if this discussion shall continue until I can reach my office, I will produce it in his published letter.

Mr. DEVELIN—It may be that he was quoting one of our English poets who talks about an "awful pause." [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER—I do not understand the purport of the gentleman's remark, but Governor Seymour will hereafter realize it. Gentlemen in this Convention may attempt to laugh and sneer down if they can, this exposure of Governor Seymour and his connection with the riots of 1863; but let the families of New York and Brooklyn, the families of those who lost their lives, of those whose blood was spilled in those riots, let them speak upon this subject, and perhaps they are capable of expressing as correct an opinion and appreciation of Governor Seymour's motives and intentions at that time, as any of the members of this Convention who are now attempting to laugh down a matter so disastrous to life and property in New York as this. That letter, sir, was followed in a few days by a speech from the Governor, delivered in the Academy of Music in the city of New York. I believe there are gentlemen present in this Convention who heard that speech. I read it the next day after its delivery, and as I have some of the language used at hand, I will read it to this Convention. The Governor of the State appeared at the Academy of Music in New York, and delivered a speech upon the crisis of the times. He went there to meet his fellow citizens of the great city of New York, which is undoubtedly as orderly and quiet a city as any in the State, a city in which riots cannot be very easily provoked, and there, in his address to an intelligent audience, and after talking of the calamities that our armies had suffered from time to time, after enumerating the promises with which the people had been treated of victory on the Mississippi and upon the Potomac, and the disappointments they had realized, and after speaking of the general gloom that was pervading the whole country, of the useless expenditure of life and property, the demoralization of the people, in all of which calamities the republican administration then in power had, as he alleged, involved the nation, the Governor said, addressing his political opponents—"Are you not exposing yourselves, your own interests, to as great a peril as that which you threaten us? [Meaning the Vallandigham party.] Remember this, that the bloody, treasonable and revolutionary doctrine of public necessity, can be proclaimed by a mob as well as by a government." In which sentiment he was applauded by his friends and sympathizers. This extract nearly completes the picture. In this you see the Governor of this great State, which claims to have more wealth, more population, and more character than any other State in the Union—you see the Governor of the State invoking the mob spirit in the city of New York, and invoking it not merely in that city, but throughout the State. What of it? This was on the Fourth of July, and on the thirteenth, when the draft commenced, that mob, remembering what their Governor, their "friend," had told them, that a mob could proclaim the law of necessity as well as a goverment, broke out into open and destructive riot. That speech of Governor Seymour's was not only an incitement, but to the rabble a justification of that riot, and its spirit was the spirit that occasioned or threatened mobs in nearly every city and village in the State. Now I desire to say to my friend from New York and my friends from Troy, that we in the country had no metropolitan police to keep the peace for us, and we did not want any; and I may say, furthermore, to those gentlemen, and to Superintendent Kennedy, that we in the country knew precisely the state of feeling that existed, and we predicted that riot several days before its actual occurrence. We did not get the Governor's speech until the morning of the 5th, but when we got it we had no difficulty in predicting the result, and were prepared for it; and had the people in New York and Troy been as the people were in the Mohawk valley, I assure gentlemen that the metropolitan police would not have been necessary to put down the mob. It was well known that the mob spirit could not run riot with impunity in any of the towns, cities, or villages west of this. It may not have been known by the infatuated men who were ready to imbrue their hands in the blood of their neighbors; but the leaders knew what would be the sure and inevitable consequence of any attempt at riot in that part of the State, and they knew that no mob could have resisted the power of the people who would have resolved themselves into a police throughout the State. I say that if the people of Troy and New York had done that, their riots would have been much less in extent than they were. Had Colonel O'Brien given the mob "canister" first, and then read the riot act, and had the authorities adopted the Napoleonic plan to disperse the rioters with canister first, and then read the riot act [laughter], there would have been not a tithe of the loss of blood or of treasure that there was. As I have already said, the people in the Mohawk valley and throughout central New York were prepared for such disturbances, and the leaders of this riotous spirit, knowing the preparation of the people, dared not instigate a riot there, nor provoke the shedding of a drop of blood, even at the instigation of the Governor's speech. To have done so would have been as fatal to them as the deadliest poison, because no earthly power could have rescued them from the improvised police that would have seized them on the first attempt at bloodshed. I was not present during the riots in New York, but I saw sketches in the newspapers for weeks after, detailing the incidents that occurred in different parts of that city. Law-abiding citizens, some of them, undertook their own defense, and I call the attention of the Convention to the attitude of our non-combatant friend Mr. Greeley, on that occasion. He never fights, but he had his hot water and hand grenades ready, and the mob knew it, and they did not, nor dare not disturb him. I have seen it stated that another distinguished gentleman in the city of New York, who was a prominent intended victim of the same mob feeling, had a lot of old muskets ready in his house, one round of which was said to have satisfied the appetite of this lawless mob. I mention these cases because I say that is how the mob spirit would have been met in the western part of this State, if it had broken out, and because it was the knowledge of this on the part of the leaders that preserved order there, not only at that riotous time, but from the beginning of the rebellion to its close. The suppression of the riotous spirit at that time was the greatest triumph of the war, and it was felt to be so, not only in New York, but in Richmond, not only in the east, but in the west, at Washington and along the Mississippi, from St. Louis to New Orleans. It was felt, then, that the people were determined not to pause in their support of the government, whatever governors or politicians might do. Such a power was higher and better than any police, and it was a power sufficient for the emergency. And now, sir, I have done with the mob. I felt it my duty to say what I have said to my friend from New York, and my friends from Troy, and to tell them that the proper way upon such occasions, is not to look to the police officers for the protection of property or life, but to resort to that higher law inherent in every man, which impels him to protect his property and his life against outrage and murder. To come back, Mr. Chairman, from this digression to the question more immediately connected with this discussion, it is objected to this report that it proposes to divide up the sovereignty of the State. Well, sir, it would not be becoming for me to undertake to discuss that question now. The argument of my honorable friend from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] to whom I always look and listen with respect and reverence, and whom I confess I greatly admire for the clearness and power with which he discusses the various questions to which he gives his attention in this Convention, induces me to pass over that question. It has been so amply and clearly, and as I think, unanswerably discussed by that gentleman, that I should look upon it as a weakness in myself to attempt to make any thing connected with that subject more clear. I will say, however, and I am not sure but what he said it in a much better manner than I can, that if it is parting with the sovereignty of the State to vest these powers in the electors of cities, why does not that argument apply to the country, in regard to the election of county clerks, sheriffs, surrogates and county judges. Undoubtedly it is a part of the sovereignty of the State. Every exertion of power, constitutionally made, is based upon the sovereignty of the State, and the sovereign people to whom we are about to submit the labors of this Convention, are competent to say how much of that sovereignty shall be delegated to and exercised by the Legislature, how much shall be exercised by the supreme court, and how much by each of the other departments of government. The people, the sovereign power, has a right to say how much of its power shall be imparted to the people of the county or the town, and in what mode it shall be exercised, and it does say it. Now, I would inquire of my republican friends whether they would consent to a clause in the Constitution providing that the Legislature might provide for the appointment or election of our judges and our county officers—our surrogates, our county judges, our sheriffs, our county clerks, and our justices of the peace. Would they consent to that? I do not think that my constituents would. I know that we would claim the right to elect our own officers; and we desire to have specified in the Constitution, what officers we may elect; and we want to have the Constitution deny to the Legislature the power to increase the number of those officers, or to impose upon us officers of their own appointment, against our will, against the will of the people residing in the district. Now, if the Legislature can create one officer, they may create ten. If they can impose upon us a tax of one thousand dollars without our consent, they can impose a tax of twenty or a hundred thousand dollars; and it is because of this uncertainty in regard to these matters that the people object so strongly to this theory that the Legislature is to retain and exercise the power of appointing the officers of localities. I should not be willing to submit to any such constitutional provision, and I am not willing to ask the people of any town or city to submit to what I think my constituents would not be willing to submit to. The proposition is to strike out the first section. As I said before, it is in no way conclusive of the result of the debate upon this article. We all concede the right of the people to elect their own strictly municipal officers. As I understand it, nobody proposes to take that right from them. But in looking over the report I frankly say that I do not concur with my friend from New York [Mr. Opdyke], who proposes a property qualification for the electors of aldermen. I do not believe it would be acceptable to the electors of either the city or the country. I entirely concur with my friend from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence] in the views that he has expressed upon that subject. We have not required a property qualification in any other part of this Constitution. We allow the towns to elect their justices of the peace, and the counties to elect their county judges, their surrogates and their clerks; and I cannot see any reason, unless there is some great defect in the character of the electors of the city of New York, why they should be deprived of the same right which we have and demand. I am also opposed to one provision in the report of the majority of the committee which proposes to vest the power in the mayor to appoint the heads of the departments, and to dismiss them at his will. I have no personal interest or feeling about that, but I regard it theoretically as a dangerous power to vest in any one man. It seems to me that if in a city like New York the power and responsibility was divided up between the mayor and the common council, or between the mayor and some other responsible officer elected by the people of the city, it would be better. I desire to hear the views of gentlemen from the city upon this question, but theoretically I am opposed to vesting that great power in the mayor of New York or of any other city. It is asked by gentlemen who are opposed to this report, and who are in favor of adopting, as I understand, the clause of the Constitution of 1846 in respect to cities and villages, "What if Mayor Wood had the power proposed to be vested in the mayor by this article—what a horrible state of things you would have in the city of New York!" Now, my theory is that if Mayor Wood exercised that power imprudently, injudiciously or wrongly, to the prejudice of the people, there is wealth and intelligence and power enough among the people of that city to correct the evil themselves, just as we in a county, having elected bad officers at one election, go at it the next time and elect a better set of men. I believe that under this arrangement the people of the city of New York and the city of Brooklyn will be more attentive to their primary caucuses, and more careful in the selection of their candidates for office. The responsibility will be devolved upon men of wealth and character, who now, I fear, take but little interest in politics, unless they are speculators or professional politicians. I am told that you can go into that city upon the eve of a general election, when the whole country is aroused with excitement in regard to the questions before the people, and find there twenty or thirty thousand business men sitting quietly in their offices and stores, who hardly know that there is an election impending. Now, the maxim that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty" applies to the city of New York as well as to the rest of the world, and the men of wealth and character in that city must go out and elect good men to serve them in official positions; and if they do not, if they elect bad men, the people of New York must suffer the consequences. It is said, however, that the people of the country may suffer the consequences. I answer that if there is such a large number of persons from the country doing business in the city of New York as we are told there is, and if they cannot find satisfactory municipal protection there, let them go and do business where they can be protected. These evils will work their own cure, and I desire, sir, to vest in the people of these cities all the power of local self-government that is vested in the people of other portions of the State. Mr. Chairman, I have already said more than I intended to say when I got up, and I here conclude.

Mr. DEVELIN—I do not rise to make any extended remarks on this subject of mobs, but merely to say to the gentleman who has just taken his seat that there was no intention on my part to laugh or sneer at him. I have known him for a great many years, and there is no gentleman in this Convention for whom I have a greater respect. His remarks about the commissioners of emigration I entirely agree with. He has been almost a father to that commission, and, as he says, it is a national matter. I remember, years and years ago, when he was in the Legislature, that he did all he could to advance the interests of foreigners who were coming to the port of New York, and to support the commissioners of emigration. I make this statement because he seemed to think that I was sneering at him.

Mr. BAKER—I did not understand the gentleman to mean any sneer at me personally. I supposed it had reference to the remarks that I was making in respect to the letters and the speech of Governor Seymour and the effect I attributed to them.

Mr. DEVELIN—Well, I think the gentleman has misconstrued Governor Seymour. I am no friend of Governor Seymour, and I do not agree with him, although a democrat. [Laughter.] Well, you need not laugh. I am not a friend of his, but I know very well that when you want to talk to a mob it is just as well to call them your friends as "you brutes." [Laughter.] I think Governor Seymour had a very distinguished example for his mode of address upon that occasion, that of our blessed Saviour, who once said of a mob, "Forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Mr. FRANCIS—I move that the committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Francis, and it was declared carried.

So the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. CORBETT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Cities, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had directed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on granting leave, and it was declared carried.

Mr. FRANCIS—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Francis, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 29, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. R. H. ROBINSON.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. McDONALD—I give notice that I shall move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment I proposed to the first section of the report of the Committee on Education was lost.

The PRESIDENT—The motion will lie on the table under the rule.

Mr. AXTELL—I ask leave to present a report from the select committee in relation to providing for disabled soldiers.

Mr. AXTELL proceeded to read the report as follows:

The select committee to which was referred the subject of permanent provision for disabled soldiers, having had the matter under consideration, report as follows:

The obligation of a government to provide fully and amply for the care of soldiers disabled in its service, is of the most sacred character.

In this nation the federal government, the representative of nationality, is especially charged with the fulfillment of this obligation.

There are two methods by which the national government cares for its disabled soldiers.

There is a system of pensions, graduated according to the extent of disability, and, in addition to the pensions paid, homes have been established, to which are admitted those who have been totally disabled in the service, and others whose disabilities are of a very serious nature. There are three of these homes already established, one in each of the following States: Maine, Wisconsin and Ohio.

The pensions allowed, while probably larger than are paid by any other government, are not an adequate provision for those who are totally or severely disabled; and the homes are only available to such as are willing to separate themselves from all home associations.

The highest pensions to private soldiers are twenty-four dollars per month, and these are paid to such as have lost both arms, both legs, both eyes, or an arm and a leg, etc.

For the loss of an arm, a leg or an eye, the pension is fifteen dollars per month.

In view of the actual needs of these men, who does not see that these provisions are totally inadequate? They are a mere pittance doled out to them, instead of being an honest recognition of a just and sacred claim, and a fair attempt to satisfy it. The men who, in defense of the country, have sacrificed their power of providing for themselves—the men who are maimed and mutilated—should receive from the country, not merely a sufficiency to keep them from starving and to cover their nakedness, but the means of a comfortable and honorable livelihood.

Can a man maintain and educate a family on the highest pension allowed to a private soldier? Some of these men have families dependent upon them, and they doubtless have the same laudable ambition to provide as well for them as that which inspires men who have never periled their lives for the integrity of the nation; yet they are doomed, by the narrow and stinted policy of the government, to see those dependent upon them in a condition of penury, from which they have no power to elevate them.

Others, and probably a majority of disabled soldiers, are young men; they are without families, and by the circumstances in which they find themselves, are practically forbidden to enter into domestic relations—to gather around them the home circle; they have no means of maintaining families, and therefore must become vagabonds and outcasts from society. It is exceeding difficult for those of them who have the power to perform some labor to obtain employment, employers preferring the service of men who are able to do the full work of men.

The avenues to those public positions whose duty they might perform, are carefully and jealously guarded by able-bodied politicians who relax not their vigilance even at the approach of the disabled Union soldier.

It is not at all probable that the national government will be induced to make a more complete provision for disabled soldiers; the question therefore arises, will the State add to the pittance which these men receive?

Your committee are of opinion that this question is an appropriate subject of legislation rather than of constitutional provision, and therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention earnestly and respectfuly recommend the Legislature of this State to make a further and permanent provision for the soldiers of this State, disabled in the military service of the United States in the war for the suppression of the late rebellion.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

N. G. AXTELL,
W. A. REYNOLDS,
J. P. ARMSTRONG

Mr. HATCH—I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee upon Revision be instructed to strike out of the article on canal management section 3, which authorizes the Governor to nominate to the Senate and with its consent appoint a superintendent of public works.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise the point of order that the resolution is not admissible.

Mr. HATCH—I wish to say in explanation of the resolution this: Meetings are being held all over the State by carriers and shippers, and they protest against this particular section which has been adopted in the article. They are in favor of the old system, and if the Convention will permit me I would like to read a single resolution—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Hatch] that the mode which he suggests is an unparliamentary way of reaching the object which he desires.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HATCH—If they do not object, I see no—

Mr. ALVORD—I object.

The PRESIDENT—The objection is taken by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], and the resolution must lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS—The report of the Committee of the Whole on cities has been before the Convention for nearly a week. While I do not desire in the least to abridge discussion, it does seem to me that the subject has been very fully discussed and that gentlemen of the Convention have about made up their minds upon it; and I move, therefore, that hereafter in the consideration of that report, debate to each speaker be restricted to twenty minutes, and that each delegate have the opportunity to speak but once.

Mr. SILVESTER—I shall feel constrained to oppose this resolution, while I have no intention to occupy any of the time of the Convention or committee in the discussion of this question. I understand that there are several gentlemen who wish to be heard upon this subject, and, I think the Convention will desire to hear them on this important subject, and certainly more time has not been devoted to it than has been devoted to other subjects which have not elicited so much attention from the public. I hope that the resolution will not be urged; if it is, I shall feel compelled to insist on a count.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I think it very important to come to a speedy conclusion on the subject of this report. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris], so far as to say that at twelve o'clock the question shall be taken on discharging the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of this report, and that will give an opportunity for every member to debate the question, and to do it before a fixed time. If that be regarded as a test question, the Convention will know whether the article can be adopted or not.

Mr. HARRIS—I am quite willing to accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks].

The question was announced on the motion of Mr. Harris, as amended on the suggestion of Mr. E. Brooks.

Mr. SEAVER—I would suggest to the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] that he make a still further amendment in addition to the resolution; it is that no member, in the mean time, who has occupied the floor on this question, shall speak so long as any other member desires the floor.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I do not understand the motion as it has been now amended, and I would like to know what it is in its present shape.

The PRESIDENT—The pending question is on discharging the Committee of the Whole from its consideration of the article roported by the Committee on Cities, to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Harris, as amended, and it was declared carried.

Mr. SILVESTER—I call for the count.

The question was again put on the motion of Mr. Harris, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 48 to 27.

Mr. LAPHAM—I offer the following resolution:

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the committee be instructed to amend the ninth section of the article on judiciary by adding at the end and forming a part thereof the following:

"The concurrence of at least two-thirds of the judges holding a general term of the supreme court and the court of appeals, shall be necessary to the validity of a judgment deciding a law by a general or public nature unconstitutional."

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that, until the vote by which the article alluded to in the resolution was adopted has been reconsidered, the resolution of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] is not in order.

Mr. HATCH—I desire to know whether the ruling of the chair applies to a resolution which was laid upon the table some three or four weeks ago, and which I shall probably call up to-morrow or next day?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Hatch] that the rule will attach to that resolution, if it has not been already acted upon. The Chair was not disposed to make that point of order, but it having been made by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] the Chair is bound to respect it.

Mr. FOLGER—I desire to give notice that I shall move the reconsideration of the vote adopting the article in reference to the judiciary, in order that I may move to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to so amend the article that the present judges of the court of appeals shall remain in office until the expiration of their respective terms.

The PRESIDENT—The article on the judiciary having never been adopted the notice and motion are unnecessary.

Mr. WALES—I desire to call up a resolution offered by me on Friday last, relating to the United States deposit fund.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to add the following to the article on education and the funds relating thereto, viz.:

SEC. 2. The Legislature shall provide by law for investing in the bonds of the government of the United States under the direction of the State treasurer, the principal of the United States deposit fund, as it shall be paid in to the loan commissioners of the several counties.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair thinks the resolution under its ruling is out of order.

Mr. LAPHAM—I desire to give notice that I shall move the reconsideration of the vote by which the ninth section of the article on the judiciary was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—The question was not put on the consideration of this article upon the separate sections, but upon the article as a whole.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I desire to call up a resolution offered by me yesterday morning.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to amend the article on corporations, so that the Legislature shall not be prevented from chartering literary, charitable and scientific corporations.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair decides this resolution to be out of order under its ruling, as attempting to secure indirectly the reconsideration of the vote adopting the article.

Mr. COMSTOCK—If the section had been passed upon distinctly I should think the point of order well taken, but it is an additional article.

The PRESIDENT—Does the Chair understand the resolution to instruct the Committee on Revision to amend an article already adopted?

Mr. COMSTOCK—It is already adopted. I expect I will have to give notice of a motion to reconsider the vote by which the article was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—The notice will be received.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I move to reconsider the vote by which the article was adopted on corporations other than municipal.

The PRESIDENT—The motion will lie on the table under the rule.

Mr. HALE—I give notice that I shall move a reconsideration of the vote by which the section prohibiting towns from bonding themselves for railroads and other purposes was lost.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair is unaware whether that section was adopted by a vote or not.

Mr. HALE—I will simply give notice.

The PRESIDENT—The notice is received.

Mr. MORRIS—I wish to give notice that I shall move a reconsideration of the vote by which the article on the powers and duties of the Legislature was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—The notice is received.

Mr. SILVESTER—I desire to give notice that I shall move a reconsideration of the vote by which that section of the report of the Finance Committee was adopted, which requires the Legislature to provide, in the law for a taxation, that persons shall make statements of their property, under oath, to the assessors.

Mr. ALVORD—There are two other motions to reconsider that question already lying on the table.

Mr. SILVESTER—I will also give notice of a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] to the article on the judiciary was lost.

The PRESIDENT—That motion has been already reconsidered in Convention.

Mr. SILVESTER—The article, I suppose, can be reconsidered. The article was only referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to report complete, and then is to be referred to the Committee on Revision.

The PRESIDENT—The notice is received.

Mr. E. BROOKS—That article was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for the purpose of revision, so that it will take the place of the Committee on Revision.

Mr. BICKFORD—I wish to give notice that I shall move to reconsider the vote by which the article on the organization of the Legislature was adopted, with the view to amend it so as to modify the pay of members of the Legislature.

The PRESIDENT—The notice is received.

Mr. HATCH—I wish to give the same notice in relation to the article on finance, that I shall move to reconsider that.

The PRESIDENT—The notice is received.

Mr. SILVESTER—I desire to give notice that I shall move a reconsideration of the article on the organization of the Legislature so far as it relates to the manner in which members of the Assembly shall be elected.

Mr. LAPHAM—With the permission of the Chair, I desire to make a suggestion. I understood the point of order taken by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] to go this extent only that, wherever the resolution of instruction sought to impress some new matter in the article which had been passed on by the Convention, it was out of order.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair did not understand the resolution to be limited in that way.

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman from Ontario give way for a moment? For the purpose of going to work and sitting here for another year, and going over the entire business of this Convention, I give notice that I shall move the reconsideration of all the work we have done up to the present time. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT—The notice of the gentleman is received.

Mr. LAPHAM—The suggestion I desire to make is this: that, whenever the notice is to incorporate a new section, it is within the rule stated by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair must differ with the gentleman. The Chair believes that when the Convention has once adopted an article it should be considered closed; otherwise it must result in the protraction of our session for the good part of another year.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I think the point of order stated by the President is correct. Gentlemen must conclude, if they will reflect, that the ruling of the Chair is a parliamentary one. For example, we adopt an article in full, and take a vote of the Convention upon it. It is obvious that before we can act upon any of the details of an article we must act upon the main question itself. This is parliamentary, and just, and the decision of the Chair is plainly correct.

Mr. LAPHAM—Then I give notice that I will at some future day move to reconsider the vote by which the article on the judiciary was adopted, in order that the article may be amended so as to add at the end of section 9, and as part of that section, the following:

"The concurrence of at least two-thirds of the judges holding a general term of the supreme court and the court of appeals shall be necessary to the validity of a judgment deciding a law by a general or public nature unconstitutional.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I wish to offer the following amendment, and ask its reference to the Committee on the Bill of Rights.

Resolved, That the article on the preamble and bill of rights be so amended that losses arising from riotous tumults in any of the counties of this State shall be amply reimbursed by adequate taxation upon the assessed value of the property in such county.

Digitized by Google

The PRESIDENT—The Committee on the Bill of Rights having reported, the amendment will be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The Convention again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Cities, Mr. RUMSEY, of Steuben, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the amendment of Mr. Spencer to strike out the first section.

Mr. CURTIS—I have listened, Mr. Chairman, I hope with candor, I am sure with attention, to this long debate. I have waited, sir, with great patience to hear, if it were possible, what good reason could be urged by any gentleman that the people of the State of New York should delegate to a certain portion of the population powers so momentous, powers so extraordinary, powers, under the circumstances of the case and in view of the character of the city of New York, so unprecedented as those which are recommended in the report now under consideration. But from the calm and careful discourse of the honorable chairman of the committee [Mr. Harris], through the speech of every gentleman who has addressed the Convention, I have listened in vain to learn that reason. The chairman of the committee expressed the sentiment at the outset of the discussion, which has been constantly repeated here, and which has been perpetually urged in the city of New York and wherever the question has been debated, and which involves, as it seems to me, a radical error from which it is absolutely essential, that the mind of the Convention be cleared before it can proceed to a just decision upon this subject. Immediately before the late municipal election in the city of New York, the present mayor of that city in one of his public speeches, spoke of the "unjust interference with the rights of the citizens of New York." The chairman of the committee, in his elaborate address, alludes to "the genius of our institutions, the right of local administration of affairs, the principle of popular government." And, sir, my experience in all that I have heard upon this subject teaches me that there is a conviction that somehow a fundamental principle of the government is invaded by the system which allows the people of the whole State to regulate, in every detail, the exercise of their sovereignty. An earlier mayor of New York, some ten years ago, who at that time was upon the point of disputing with arms the supremacy of the people of the State, to restrain whose action the Governor—then, I believe, present in the city—found it necessary to retain in the city a State regiment upon its march to another portion of the country, another person who had been mayor, I say, under the feeling of which I speak, when again soliciting the suffrages of the citizens for the office of mayor, did not hesitate to say in stronger terms than those used last evening by the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence], that the oppressions of the city of New York were greater than those against which the colonists, our forefathers, rose in arms. Now, sir, with these views in the minds of persons conspicuous by position or ability, it is essential that as the first step in this discussion we come clearly to a perception of the point, what are the rights of the people of the State. In other words, what is this theory of the government to which allusion is so constantly made? Now, Mr. Chairman, when my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris], or my friend from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence], speaks of the local right of government, what does he mean? Does he mean that if in the city of New York you seal up Cherry street at both ends, the people in that street have the right of local self-government? that if you separate Castle Garden from the rest of the city, it has a right to local self-government? that if you separate the first ward or the fifteenth ward, or the twelfth ward or the sixth ward, from the rest of the city, it has a local right of government? Does he mean if you take all the wards together, they have the local right of government? Does he mean, in other words, that in this State a quarter, a tenth or a hundredth part of the population have a right of self-government? Sir, the gentleman does not mean any such thing. No gentleman competent to express an opinion means any such thing as this, although that is the necessary implication from the words that he uses. All that he means is this: that the American principle asserts the right of every political community to govern itself, and that in that community the people are the source of power. That, sir, is all that any gentleman can mean when he uses the phrases of which I have spoken. Now, the political community with which we have to deal, I may remind gentlemen of this committee, is the State of New York. All political authority whatever within the State is derived from the people of the State. They may express their authority either in the fundamental law, known as the Constitution, or they may express it in the form of statute law, or they may reserve to themselves, as occasion may arise, the exercise of that authority. In other words, the political power remains where it belongs, in the whole people of the State of New York? Well, sir, then what is our first duty? Since duties and rights are correlative—since the right of government in this State rests with the people—since the source of all political power in this State is the people—what is the first duty of the people of the State of New York? It is precisely what my friend from Onondaga, Mr. Alvord, declared it to be the other day; it is first of all the security of the most perfect liberty, the security of life, the security of every citizen in the State in the fruits of his industry. These are the great cardinal objects for which governments are instituted. To protect these the people of the State of New York are the source of power, and their duty is to establish such a form of government in this State that all of those rights shall everywhere be secured. Equal and exact justice were the words of my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. Sir, in its nature, justice is equal and exact. My friend merely follows the usual phrase, and I follow him that I may give greater emphasis to this truth—such emphasis as may be given by repetition, namely, that the first duty of the people of New York is to secure equal and exact justice on every inch of its domain to every citizen, whatever his condition, however wretched. I say, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary that we should clearly understand this point. I know that there are gentlemen whose votes are probably to be cast in support of the idea that the people of the city of New York have been deprived of certain rights. Sir, I hope they will see that whatever rights the people of the State of New York, who live in that part of it called the city, may have, are not rights, but grants; they are powers that are derived solely from the people, the source of all the power in the State. Now, sir, if I am correct thus far, the next step is this, that, following reason and experience, the people of the State of New York being sovereign, in order to secure the rights, which it is the object of government to secure, institute a certain political organization in the State. After due reflection, they divide the State for political purposes, into counties, cities, towns and villages, school districts and whatever other districts may be found essential to the common welfare—and for what purpose? As a means simply of securing good government to every citizen. To no other purpose do States and counties and towns, and villages, and cities exist, than as a means of securing good government to every citizen of the State. In other words, the whole people delegate certain of their powers to certain smaller parts of the whole people for the purpose of local convenience, but no less, sir, for the purpose of the common welfare. Now, how much or how little of this power shall be granted—how it shall be administered for the local convenience and public welfare—are purely questions of expediency. And that is the question, sir, with which we are now confronted. I say what I have said in order that our minds may no longer be obscured by a false theory of the government. The principle is clear. It is that the people of the whole State are to administer the political power of the State for the benefit of all its citizens, and that whenever any delegation of this power is made, whether it be much or little, it is merely a grant, merely a matter of expediency. Now, Mr. Chairman, the good sense of the people of New York, has decreed certain political organizations in the State. That with which we are now particularly concerned is the organization known as cities. Cities are of two kinds. There is one kind with which we in this country have nothing to do. We have no knowledge of, or any precedent for free cities—cities which are in themselves virtually States, which fly their own flag, which have their own government, which are accountable wholly to those who live within them for their own welfare, cities which in the middle ages stood for liberty against external foreign encroachment. The city of modern free governments is simply a collection of people, for convenience or business or pleasure. Any city in the State of New York is simply, therefore, a collection of some of the people of the State, gathered together for their own convenience, and subject to the supreme authority of the whole people. Mr. Chairman, it will be found that in the history of the State of New York from the beginning, this is the virtual principle that has been observed. The Dongan and Montgomery charters, of which we have heard so much in connection with the history of this State, are simple forms under which the sovereignty established itself, or delegated itself in these cities. The mayor and commonalty under those charters were merely ministerial officers. They performed certain administrative functions, and the city of New York is now what it always has been, a State organization for a specific purpose. All the details which regulate the internal economy of that organization are matters for the whole people of the State to decide, and they will regulate them according to their best view of what the welfare of the State demands. Now, sir, I will not repeat the various authoritative expressions of judicial opinion upon this point which have been made upon this floor. That of Judge Nelson, quoted by Mr. Francis, is conclusive. Chancellor Kent held the same view. Indeed it has been held by our highest courts, and by our wisest and most experienced judges that a city is simply a State organization for a specific purpose. It is only necessary that we bear this constantly in mind in order to remember the relation which the city and its economy bear to the State and its authority. Mr. Chairman, the power and right of the State, or of all the people, over a city, that is any portion of the people, being absolute, are we to fear that there is, as has been charged, a tendency to despotic centralization of this power? This is a favorite doctrine of my friend of the Evening Post, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence] quoted to us in his remarks last evening. It is a theory of the controlling and able editor of that paper who probably wrote the article from which my friend made his citation last evening, that there is in all governments a tendency toward centralization, which must be suspected and resisted. But if there be a gentleman here who fears this tendency among us, may I ask him what he understands by a centralized government? May I ask him what the government of France is to-day, which is undoubtedly a centralized power? Why, sir, the Emperor of France—an irresponsible head of the government—governs every department of the empire through certain prefectures. The prefect of the department is immediately subordinate to the Emperor and is responsible to him—the irresponsible head. Does any man in this State discover any resemblance between the uncontrolled will of Louis Napoleon in Paris governing France as it chooses, and the government of all the people of the State of New York, securing life and liberty to every citizen of the State in the method which seems to them best? Is this centralization? Why, sir, centralization is that system in which the will of an irresponsible authority, in which the people have no representation whatever, is supreme. Have we any such authority in this State? Have we any such authority in the United States anywhere? The will of the people, sir, is supreme, and according to the doctrine which has been urged upon this floor, and especially by the gentlemen who now attack the position which I occupy, and who support the extraordinary position urged in the report of the majority of the committee—I say, according to their favorite argument, incessantly repeated, distrust of the Legislature is virtually a distrust of the people. Sir, by all the theory of our government, it is unquestionably true that the Legislature is always the immediate representative of the people, and it is, therefore, absolutely impossible, under our system, so long as all the people of this State are fairly represented in the Legislature, that there can be, in the sense alleged—in the hideous and painful sense urged by the committee—a dangerous centralization in the government of the State of New York. And, sir, it is remarkable that these very gentlemen who complain of the act of the whole people as a possible centralization of power dangerous to the citizens, are the very gentlemen who insist that all the people shall surrender their power in some of the most important functions of government to certain parts of the people living in certain parts of the State. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, proceeding from these somewhat elementary views which are yet absolutely essential to a proper comprehension of the subject under discussion, the question which meets us is, whether it is desirable that the people of the State of New York shall ever, under any circumstances, surrender their authority over certain political departments of the State. That is a question which has been settled. The people have decided that it is in some respects, and for certain purposes, desirable that this should be done, and, therefore, it has been done, under certain general regulations. But in making the general delegations of power which a wise experience dictates, the question arises whether peculiar and exceptional cases may not require a departure from the general rule, to secure both the local and the general welfare. And that is precisely this case. If the city is exceptional, so may the treatment be. And I claim that in the political community of the State of New York is a city absolutely exceptional in this country—exceptional in all countries, and that since legislation is the most practical of all affairs, it is our duty to bear constantly in mind the exceptional character of that city. During the debates of this Convention whether the city of Albany should be the capital of the State, it was the pleasure of my friend from the city of New York, Mr. Robertson, to indulge in an amplitude of eulogy of that city to which I listened with incredulous amazement. Sir, when Milton described Athens as "the eye of Greece," it was certainly with a touch of poetic imagination, when we remember what the actual situation of the people of Athens was. And, sir, when I heard those brilliant numbers flowing from the lips of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson], describing the city of New York as the capital of all virtue, I felt that he had surpassed Milton in his celebration of the Grecian city. For what is the city of New York? Sir, by nature it is noble in situation. Seated at the head of a broad and ample bay, from which to every quarter of the globe sail its incessant ships, lighting every solitary harbor upon the rim of the globe with their white sails: leaning on the one hand upon the great river which stretches far up into the interior, the struggle for the possession of which was the great contest of the Revolution, from which as with a lithe forefinger, it reaches by the canal far over to the prairies of the West, and gathering through the mountains themselves all the opulence of the western fields into its lap, diffuses them over the world; leaning on the other upon the sinuous arm of the sea which flows to shrewd and rugged New England—the city of New York is unequaled in the splendor of its site, unequaled in its opportunities, one of the greatest of all the cities in the world. Day and night it hums and roars with ceaseless activity. Through its stony streets, like veins, palpitates forever the restless current of its industry. There in the night fortunes shoot up like the frost-work on these windows, and in the morning, like frost-work, those fortunes melt away. There sits the city receiving from every part of the world, at home and abroad, vast contributions of people, of skill, of industry, of goodness, and also of dense ignorance and awful crime. And as I contemplate its enormous advantages, as I pay my willing tribute to all that is noble, to all that is good, to all that is aspiring and improving, and influential, in that city, I must not fail to remind you of the shadow of the picture. I shall not fail to remind you that the very situation which makes that city so splendid, which gives it so noble opportunities, is the final reason for that exceptional character which I assert is essential to any just view of its proper government. We have heard of the great charities of New York. I pay my willing tribute to them. We have heard from the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] of the churches of New York. I pay my willing tribute to them. We have heard from the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence] of the high character of many thousands of the citizens of that city. I pay my willing tribute to it and them all. I live at present on Staten Island, a suburb of the city, but my home for many years has been in the city itself, and I know what the city of New York is. Like the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence], I will assume to speak for it. Sir, it is not the fact that a man is born in the city, it is that he has lived in it, that he has looked at it, that he has thought upon it, which enables him to speak with weight upon any subject which concerns its welfare. The city of New York, by its situation, is the gate of the State; it is the market of the State, and greatly the market of the country. At this moment its warehouses labor and strain with the riches of this State and of the whole country. At this moment the throngs that move up and down its streets of that city are counted by thousands and thousands—strangers and citizens. The city of New York, sir, is, of all places, in its interests, the least local; it is, of all cities, the one in which those who do not live there have the profoundest interest. The city of New York alone, of all cities in this country, is the one that bears the most vital relation to the State of which it is the metropolis. Now, of the population of the city of New York we have already had some details. During the last year, there came to this country more than two hundred and thirty-three thousand foreign immigrants. By the most approved statistics of the most thoughtful and careful European authorities, the constant annual immigration from Germany is in the ratio of one to every five hundred and thirty-three of the inhabitants. In Ireland, where, by the last computation, there were less than a million of persons engaged in agriculture, the constant, steady annual rate of emigration is in the ratio of one in every forty-four persons. This vast flood of emigration launches itself chiefly upon the city of New York. In the year 1866, there were about two hundred and twenty or two hundred and twenty-five thousand persons who came as emigrants to this country. Nearly one-half of this number remain in the State of New York, and the very worst part, not in every detail, not in every particular, not in every individual instance, but the very worst part of that vast immigration from Europe every year settles in and about the city of New York. Is this a fact of no interest? Is this a fact which has no bearing upon the discussion in which we are engaged? Is this a fact which ought to have no influence upon the people when they come to consider whether the fundamental functions of government shall be delegated entirely by the people of the State to the people living in the city? I say, sir, that of this vast number of immigrants that come to this country, the largest and the worst part remains in that city. And what do we naturally find? We find that three-fifths of the voting population in the city is foreign. We find that in some political districts of the city the percentage of the native population is strikingly and almost incredibly small. Are these facts of no importance? Sir, they derive their importance from one consideration—but it is not that this mass of voters is foreign. Mr. Chairman, I can certainly have no hostility to foreigners, as such. In a sense we are all foreigners upon this soil. It is not three centuries since the father of the longest settled family in the country came from other shores. In the broad, general sense, we are all foreigners; but in the specific, political sense which I intend, the fact is this, that the great mass of immigration which comes to the city of New York, exceptional in its amount, depositing itself within that city, necessarily creates a voting population unfamiliar, many of them, with our language, totally unfamiliar, most of them, with our institutions or their spirit, and the necessary prey of demagogues. It is moreover a densely ignorant population, and often a very criminal population. It is therefore upon the plainest principles a population to be very carefully scrutinized before the great functions of the defense of liberty and of right are unreservedly committed to them. Why, sir, a friend of mine who has busied himself with the greatest curiosity and interest in these researches, informs me that he finds that during the last year there were arrests in the city of New York, criminal arrests, to the number of fifty thousand, or more; and, sir, allowing for re-arrests and for aliens, it is undoubtedly fair to presume that of the fifty thousand persons so arrested at least forty thousand were voters in the city of New York. How many of these forty thousand ought we to believe, in any just view of government, fairly fit to be intrusted with the protection of the rights and liberties of the citizens without control of the whole people?

Mr. HUTCHINS—I wish to say to the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] that my researches have shown that there have been over forty-nine thousand arrests of male citizens over twenty years of age in New York during the last year.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Does the gentleman mean to say that so many separate individuals have been arrested, or does that number include the individuals who have been arrested and re-arrested and re-arrested over and over again?

Mr. CURTIS—If the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Schumaker] had noticed my statement, he would have seen that I made a deduction for re-arrests and aliens. It appears from what the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] says, that my statement may be made still stronger and more precise, and that there were actually about forty-nine thousand criminal arrests of male persons over the age of twenty-one years in the city of New York during the last year, and, making the deductions which are claimed by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Schumaker]—if you take forty thousand, which is undoubtedly a fair estimate—it is undeniable that you have, out of those persons arrested during the last year, forty thousand probable voters of the city of New York, in which there are about one hundred and twenty-three thousand registered voters. Now, sir, I ask this Convention whether they are willing to propose that the people, who alone have the power, should delegate so large a part of their supreme authority to a population of which a fact like the one that I mention can be undeniably affirmed? If I am told that this is an invasion of the democratic theory, I reject the assertion entirely. The democratic theory does not say that Cherry street will govern itself well. The democratic theory, properly interpreted, does not say that Sing Sing and Blackwell's Island will govern themselves wisely. Sir, let me not be misrepresented. I trust I shall not be understood as saying that the city of New York is Sing Sing or Blackwell's Island. I trust I shall not be understood as saying any more than I do say, that an enormous amount of the floating foreign population in the city of New York, necessarily ignorant in every respect—ignorant of our institutions, ignorant of our language, ignorant even of reading and writing, necessarily wanting every thing that makes an effective American citizen—necessarily makes that city exceptional; and therefore the people of the State should very carefully consider how much of their power shall be unreservedly delegated to the city. Mr. Chairman, experience proves the necessity of this hesitation. Reflection suggests that where you have a city so exceptionally constituted, you will presently find that the system of local government, in the breadth which is claimed for it here, will necessarily fail. What is the lesson of experience? It will soon be forty years since the system of electing the mayor in the city of New York was introduced. Up to that time the delegation of power was made by the sovereignty of the State by appointing the mayor. But the system was changed, and what was the result? Why, sir, after thirty years of the experiment of complete local government in that community the experiment was discovered to be a failure. I speak upon the authority of my honorable friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], who was then, it appears, a Senator from the city of New York, and who says that there was such dissatisfaction in the city that by common consent the men of all parties met in huge assemblages, and a cry for aid went up from the people of the city to the great body of the people of the State, that they would come down and help them out of the condition into which they had fallen. That, sir, was the origin of the commission system. It had not, as is claimed, a strictly party origin. The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] expressly denied that it was a party movement; and even if my friend from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence] had been able to substantiate his assertion, even if any gentleman upon this floor could prove that the police commission, which was the first introduction of the State power, was merely a political movement, to every political thinker and observer what is the necessary inference? This only, that the condition of the city of New York was such, the danger to life and property was so imminent, that skillful political engineers in the State, looking about to find something upon which they could base their policy, and knowing that no political policy can ever be securely founded unless it starts with a fact, seized this indisputable fact gladly, and upon it made their claim and based their policy. Do you suppose, Mr. Chairman, that it would have been possible to carry such a proposition as that of the metropolitan police, if the movers had not been able to show that the existing state of things demanded a change? Unquestionably, sir, the condition of the city did demand a change. I appeal to the intelligent public opinion of New York, I appeal to the intelligent memory of every man familiar with the state of that city at that time, to support the assertion of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] that it was a cry for relief proceeding from the best citizens of that city, irrespective of party, which was the occasion of the creation of the police commission, and that the condition then existing was the result of thirty years of the experiment of local government among an exceptional population.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Will the gentleman from Richmond permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CURTIS—Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I would like to ask what was the necessity that required that the majority of the commission should be made up of republican members?

Mr. CURTIS—I am speaking of the principle, not of the political aspects of the case. I am speaking of the principle of State supervision in a particular section of the State over the rights of property and of persons. Having proceeded so far, and having reached, in the interests of all parties and at the demand of all parties in that city, this exercise of the undoubted authority of the people of the State, the next practical question with which we have to deal is, how has this intervention of State authority resulted in the city of New York? In other words, is there reason in the experience of that action to deplore this particular exercise of the unquestionable power of the people, and to return, not to the previous condition, but to such a system as is suggested in the report of the majority of the committee, and which is, under the circumstances of the case, wholly unprecedented? Now, how has the present system worked? The chief commissions in the city of New York are the Central park commission, the fire department commission, the board of health, and the police commission. These are the special boards at which the fierce shafts of opposition are hurled here and elsewhere. Let us take for this examination the year 1866. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins], who occupied the floor yesterday morning, gave us some striking statistics of the year 1867. Let me very briefly and simply recount to the committee, they bearing in mind the necessary intention of the citation, a few facts in regard to the year 1866. The tax levy for that year as stated by the mayor in his annual message in January, 1867, was about $17,000,000. How much of this money was under the control of these commissions? Under the control of the Central park commission, and disbursed by them, was the sum of $340,000. Under the control of the fire department, and disbursed by them, were $870,000. These are round numbers. Under the control of the health board, and disbursed by them, were about $225,000; and subject to the control of the police commission were about $2,270,000. The largest part of this money, as you will see, was disbursed by the board of metropolitan police, and the great bulk of the expenditure was for the salaries of the officers and men. At that time in the board there were sixteen surgeons, whose duty is most essential and important, whose salaries were $2,250 each. There were thirty-four captains, whose salaries were $2,000 each. There were 180 sergeants, whose salaries were $1,600 each. There were 1,844 patrolmen, whose salaries were $1,200 each; and there were seventy-three doormen, at salaries of $900 each. I think, sir, that there were never salaries paid in this State that were better earned than those paid to the men of the metropolitan police of New York. Against this sum of $2,270,000 we will put the further fact, also familiar to the committee and worth while to remember at this point, that the police commission of New York is the arm of the excise board, and that during this last year, not the year I am considering, but last year, 1867, they have in that way realized for the revenues the sum of $1,200,000 as against $12,000 the previous year. Such being the expenses of the chief commission, Mr. Chairman, the questions are, first: Are there too many men employed? And second: Is the pay too large? The ratio of the police in the city of New York is the ratio of the police in Paris and London and in every great city. It is one to about every five hundred inhabitants, and in New York it is one to every five hundred of the inhabitants, without a standing army behind it, which is the support of the foreign police. Is the pay too large? I am sure there is no gentleman, whatever his views of the necessity or wisdom of this police commission, who will say that the pay of any of the various men employed by it is extravagant. Again, sir, is there any tangible charge of extravagance, carelessness or fraud in the management of this fund? If so, I have not yet heard it. There is a vague assertion that the board is used for partisan purposes; but I am speaking now of the money of the State expended by this commission; and I ask, is there any tangible charge of fraud, carelessness or extravagance? Sir, the metropolitan police system is unquestionably what Mayor Hoffman, in the letter cited by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins], declared it to be "as nearly perfect as any system in the world." My friend [Mr. Lawrence] says the mayor wrote that letter at a time when there happened to be one or two democrats in the board. But, sir, the police system is the same. Whether administered by a democratic board or by a board composed wholly of another party, the system is still the same; and the honorable mayor of New York called it "as nearly perfect as any system in the world." Well, is there any complaint of the other commissions—of the other methods by which the people of the State have chosen to exercise their authority in the management of the affairs of the city of New York? We will take the fire board, as it is called. The Convention is aware that upon our tables has been laid the petition of the fire insurance companies of New York, almost without exception, asking for the continuance of that board. As trustworthy testimony in regard to the actual working of that board, I ask what is the loose rhetoric and vague declamation of gentlemen upon this floor compared with this petition of the fire insurance companies of the city, almost without exception? So, sir, in regard to the sanitary board. In the year 1866 that board cost the State $225,000—the sanitary board which kept pestilence at bay and held back death from the homes of this great State. It seems to me not an extravagant price to pay. And as all the fire insurance companies ask for the continuance of the fire board, so all the life insurance companies ask for the continuance of the board of health. This is one of those facts which are of themselves the most eloquent and conclusive arguments. As to the police board, I suppose there are very few tax payers and property owners in the city who, if they knew that this Convention had abolished the metropolitan police board, and that the act of the Convention was final, and that the police control which has been exercised over that city for the last ten years was now to be withdrawn—would not at once feel that their property had diminished in value; and I myself know of manufactories in that city the proprietors of which declare their intention, if this kind of control be withdrawn, to move over the line into other States. Mr. Chairman, I proceed to another point in regard to the police, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. R Lawrence] was pleased to call the great police commission. Three times he used the word "great" sneeringly, in connection with the police department of New York, and not wisely as it seemed to me. We have had much reference to the famous riots in the city of New York in 1863. I am now going to say a word about those riots. I am going to show, if I can, to the people of the State of New York, through their representatives upon this floor, what is here proposed in regard to the protection of lives and property of the people of the city of New York. The riot began on Monday, July 13th, and lasted until Friday of that week. The military force of the city and of the State was absent in the field. It was one of the dark hours which, during the long and terrible war, obscured for a moment the hearts of good and true men everywhere. It was a time when the very final test was to be applied in the city of New York to the patriotism of that city and of the State. It was known, sir (despite the scepticism that has been expressed in the committee by some advocates of the report) it was previously known that trouble was imminent. It would, indeed, be a very imperfect police management in a great city which was unable to forefeel the movements of the mob spirit at such a time. It was known that disturbances were coming. It was known, precisely as it was known last spring, that grave disturbances were imminent from another cause. And, sir, I pause to quote again from Mr. Hoffman, the present mayor of the city of New York, a quotation from a speech made by him just previous to his late election, when he was soliciting the votes of his fellow-citizens, and I make it as an additional proof of the character of the population of that city, of its character as known to those who are highest in position in the party which is now in the majority in that city. Mr. Hoffman says, speaking of a certain occasion last spring, that by a "turn of his hand" there would have been a fearful mob excited in the city of New York. Sir, I respect, and I desire publicly to express my respect, worthless though it be in his estimation, for the officer who refused to give that turn of his hand, and who stood up before the people and said that he had done so. Well, sir, this being the character of these people, a people so susceptible, by the confession of the mayor of New York, that by a mere turn of his hand he could have produced a fearful riot among them last spring, it is easy to understand what the situation was at the time of the great riot. Fortunately, Mr. Chairman, we had at that time a mayor whose hand is turned always toward intelligent order; but all the military of the State were absent, and the riot began. The police had taken their measures. They had secured the arsenals, they had done what they could to save the city. You will remember, sir, that the population of the city of New York is nearly a million in number, and you will remember that the worst part of the population had not gone to the war, but remained in the city, and knew that the military were absent. Sir, I desire you also to remember that the police force that was left in that city was scarcely more than two thousand men. Well, the onset came. From every quarter of the city the lurking and dangerous population was at once revealed. It sprang to life in every corner. It appeared to have an organization. Sir, it had the organization of a common hatred and a common treason. It had the organization which bad men have everywhere. And for nearly a whole day, despite the efforts of the police, those rioters in the city of New York did virtually hold that city by terror. The riot began on Monday morning, and the military from the neighborhood arrived on Tuesday afternoon, as Gen. Brown says, as allies to the gallant police. Yet, for three days business was generally suspended, and the rioters raged through the streets. I will not recount the horrors of that time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] recited to us some of them; but there are facts which have never been printed, there are incidents known to me, at which the heart of the bravest man would almost stand still, and his tongue refuse speech. It was not only a riot—the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] is correct, though his argument has not the bearing that he seems to suppose—not merely a riot, it was a movement of the rebellion. While brave and loyal men elsewhere, stood fronting the foe in the field, there in the streets of New York, in little squads of three or four hundred, that intrepid regiment of two thousand men, the great left wing of the army that stood braced against the rebellion, were also fighting the same great battle, but in a thousand-fold more ghastly form. The police of New York were on that day the army of the nation in the streets of the city, protecting you, every one of you, protecting the State every inch of it; protecting, as I believe, sir, the United States from a counter revolution that was ready to spring from that tremendous riot in the city of New York. Nor is there any regiment that has returned with its honorable banners torn in the battle-field, which deserves more lasting honor in the history of this country, than that brave band of two thousand men, of every faith, of every party, who stood firm in the city of New York, breasting bloody rebellion, and sealing the victory that was won at Gettysburg. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] says that after all it was only an episode of the rebellion, after all it was a sporadic phenomenon of the great civil war. Sir, he will pardon me. It was undoubtedly an episode of the rebellion, but it was an appalling episode, because of the peculiar character of the city. There were thousands of true men and women in New York who gave freely to support the war—sending regiment after regiment to the field. But it is undoubtedly true, nor will any gentleman deny it, that the city had a vast population, ready and eager at any moment to do what could be done to withstand the progress of the national arms, and to defeat the national victory. Now, sir, if the arrangement provided in the report of the majority of the Committee on Cities, had existed at that time, what would have been the situation in the city of New York? And, sir, under that arrangement, if it be adopted, what will always be the situation when any similar emergency shall arise hereafter? Simply this, sir, that the mayor, for three years, as proposed, the supreme head of the city government, the mayor, appointing every officer in the departments under him, the mayor appointing every policeman, who will be in that case what the honorable gentleman from Brooklyn [Mr. Murphy] truly declared he would be, a member of the mayor's body guard—the mayor with his police dependent upon the votes of this kind of population, yielding to the same instinct which made the supreme executive of the State, confronting those red-handed rioters address them as "my friends," instead of addressing them as the armed and fiery embodiment of the authority of the laws of the people of New York—the mayor will inevitably do what? Sir, I do not hesitate to say that, with a city government modeled upon the principles which are laid down in the article reported by the majority of this committee, the Sixth regiment of Massachusetts would not have reached Baltimore before it met its first fierce ordeal; but, in the city of New York, marching down Broadway, it would have encountered its first battle in the great war for Freedom and Union. And so it will be again. The gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] says that that riot was merely a sporadic phenomenon of the rebellion. So it was; but always a population of the exceptional character of so much of that of the city of New York, instinctively sympathizes with lawlessness. As it would have been then, sir, so would it be again. Nor this alone. I have not yet done with the riots of 1863. While those riots were at their deadliest and worst, while the most outraged and forsaken of the inhabitants of this State, or of any country in the world, were being dragged through the streets, were being burned and torn asunder, stoned, and shot, and hung, while the mad fury of this riot caused the city of New York to rock and reel with terror, there were organs of public opinion in that city—I do not speak of parties—there were organs of public opinion doing all they could to excuse and palliate, and thereby to foment and stimulate these fearful massacres.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Will my friend [Mr. Curtis] be pleased to name some of those organs of public opinion?

Mr. CURTIS—I will do so. The newspaper known as the Herald called the rioters "the people;" the newspaper known as the World called the rioters "the laboring population;" the paper known as the Evening Express called them "enraged and outraged conscripts," and this, sir, while they were plunging the knife into the very hearts of the noblest men, into the very hearts of the most destitute and forlorn human beings in that city.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CURTIS—Yes, sir.

Mr. E. BROOKS—The gentleman having named those respective journals in this important place and at this important time, I now call upon him, as a fair and just man, to place the text and the context together, that we may see just what was said at that place and time by those journals.

Mr. CURTIS—I am unable to do so at this moment. I have not the context by me.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Then I trust that my colleague will allow me to say, in behalf of one of the journals he has named, that his inference is entirely unfair and untrue.

Mr. CURTIS—If the gentleman will allow me, I should prefer to continue my remarks. At the request of my colleague [Mr. E. Brooks], I have quoted the phrases that were used by those journals. I have quoted phrases that were used, I do not say by party organs—I have avoided that expression—but phrases that were used by the organs of a certain public opinion in the city of New York. Sir, the use which I wish to make of the fact is this: that precisely the same public opinion which declared this frightful mob to be a rising of "the people," a rising of "the laboring population," a rising of the "enraged and outraged conscripts," is now the public opinion which, by the same organs, and by its orators upon this floor, asks of the people of the State of New York that they will surrender (for it comes to that under this article) the protection of life and property in that city to the guardianship of those who made or palliated the riots of 1863. I commend this fact to every gentleman in the Convention. It makes no difference as to that fact, whether those riots were parts of the rebellion or whether they were not. If such things are done in a great crisis like that, what would be done in a lesser crisis? If, when the struggle is for the very salvation of the government of the country, these men would not hesitate to take this position and say these things, what would they not be willing to do when it was a mere riot perhaps for the purpose of "clearing out" a few negroes in a back street? I put it to you, sir, and to this Convention, that these gentlemen, with this record, have placed themselves beyond the right fairly to demand that the government of the city of New York shall be given up to that kind of public opinion. Mr. Chairman, I am aware that there are lower considerations which have been introduced into this discussion; I am aware that my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], with whom I believe I have proceeded harmoniously since this Convention began its sessions, except upon one occasion, and then, sir, the exception was a mere slight difference of opinion, and not, as he seemed to think, a graver difference—I am aware that he has told us, and that my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] has told us, and that the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], of another party, who, I am sorry to see, is not now in his seat, has told us that it would be an unwise party measure for this Convention to adopt any other than the article recommended by the chairman of the Committee on Cities. Now, I do not intend to drag any political discussion into this committee. If there be an arena in the State in which ordinary party quarrels should be hushed, it is a Constitutional Convention. If there be a place in the country where great political principles should assert themselves, where all decisions should be reached only by the most liberal, the most careful, and the most prudent thought, it is a Constitutional Convention. But, sir, I will say to my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], as I will say to any gentleman with whom I have been accustomed to vote when party questions are involved, that the principles of the party with which I act, are as dear to me as they can be to any member of it. The principles of that party, in my judgment, are those by which alone the permanent freedom and prosperity of this country can be secured. They are those truly democratic principles which my friend from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence] fondly asserted to be his own, an assertion which he instantly corrected when he remembered that he was a partisan. Declaring as a man that the true democratic doctrine required that all the people of this State should be the source of political power upon equal terms, he corrected himself by saying that all the white people of this State should be the source of political power. While he spoke, as I will believe, his unbiased thought, his speech was as serious as I believe his heart to be; but when he remembered party, the advocate of equal rights became the special pleader of the caste of his color and the aristocracy of his race. Mr. Chairman, my friend, if he will permit me to say so, belongs to the "white democracy." [Laughter.] I, sir, God helping me, belong to the great democracy of man, the democracy of humanity. He, if he chooses, as honestly, fairly and justly as he may, will urge what he believes to be his democracy upon the support of the people of the State and the country. I believe that there will be no peace in the land, that it will rock to and fro with the most violent agitation, until the true democracy of man prevails, and the equal rights for which he contended with his lips shall be the law of the heart of the land. I say that the principles of my party are as dear to me as they can be to any man; I say to my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] that, long a disciple of that party, long following illustrious leaders, I have moved on as well as I could toward that great consummation. That the policy of the nation, under the control of that party, and that of the State, should be the most absolute security of every right of life and liberty to every citizen in the land. That, sir, is the chief principle of the party which I have followed, and to which I belong. All the policies which that party may adopt, which shall secure justly, legally and fairly that result, are the policies which as a party man I support. And because I believe that the measures recommended by the chairman of the committee [Mr. Harris] necessarily imperil that result, I diverge from my friend, and if my party chooses to march on in what I conceive to be a mistaken policy, in what reason and experience prove to be mistaken, then I shall have to diverge from that party, as it seems upon this point I am to diverge from my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. Nor, should another consideration which has been urged in this debate, be of the least influence. I have heard it said privately, and asserted publicly, that it was necessary that the city of New York should be remanded to itself, that there was no other remedy, that the extremity was so supreme, so absolute, that now the city must be delivered over to itself, because there was no way to peace except through a vigilance committee, in other words, except through anarchy and revolution. Sir, I do not believe it, and whether I believe it or not I agree with the statesman who warned us not to praise revolutions, for they are at all honorable cost to be avoided. Let no man think that this knot is to be cut by the sword of revolution. Let no man think that the only way to peace and good government for the city of New York lies through the fearful precedent that we beheld in July, 1863. No, sir; it is we, sitting here as statesmen; it is we, sitting here as primal legislators, who are to take care that the city, lying under the awful menace of blood, the city of which we have the rightful care, shall receive the utmost benefit of that care. And I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to my friends upon this floor, and through them I appeal to the great people of the State of New York, that this may be done. I speak for those who did not extenuate, who did not palliate; I speak for those who do not say as my friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] said the other night (language which I took down at the time), that there was "provocation" of those massacres; I speak, sir, for the minority in that city now, for the minority in that city always, for the most forlorn, the most outraged, the most oppressed, against whom the wild fury of such a population as that of New York will in any excitement always be directed. Their hope is in the people of this State. By my lips, at this moment, they ask this Convention not to tie up the hands of the people of the State, not to abdicate the authority of the people, not to build a wall between that part of the State and the rest of the people. They ask humbly that this Convention will now retain in the hands of all the people that authority which is theirs by the theory and practice of our institutions, that authority which they are bound to exercise wisely, that authority which they throw away if they adopt the article reported by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DALY—Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DEVELIN—Will the gentleman [Mr. Daly] yield to me a moment?

Mr. DALY—Yes, sir.

Mr. DEVELIN—Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] has already spoken once upon this subject. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], who first addressed the Chair, has the floor.

Mr. DEVELIN—He gives way to me for a moment. The democracy of the gentleman from Richmond—

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—It is that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] cannot speak a second time upon this question when other gentlemen desire the floor.

Mr. DEVELIN—I have not spoken upon this question; I have only asked a question.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] cannot speak a second time under the rule.

Mr. DEVELIN—It is a question of fact. I have not yet spoken upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair understands that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] followed the gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand].

Mr. DEVELIN—Not to discuss the question at all—merely to make an explanation.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I insist upon the point of order

Mr. DEVELIN—But it is a question of fact whether I have spoken upon this matter or not.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair understands that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] has already spoken once upon this question.

Mr. DEVELIN—Then I yield to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DALY—Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to have spoken upon this question. I took occasion, during the sitting of the committee, to express my views very fully upon this subject, and being satisfied with the report of the majority of the committee in its general features, I meant to confine what I had to say to one or two provisions in it to which I objected when the sections containing them should come under consideration. But it is impossible, sir, to remain silent after what I have just listened to. It is a duty which I owe to my constituents to see that the gentlemen of this Convention should not be misled by the representations which have been made respecting the great city, which I have the honor to represent and the rights of which they are asked to recognize and fix by provisions to be inserted in the fundamental law. My eloquent friend from New York [Mr. Curtis] with the attractive and persuasive manner which so eminently distinguishes him, and with the full effect of that musical voice of which he is so exquisite a master, especially in the minor key, has raised a cry of lamentation over the city of New York, equaled only by Jeremiah wailing over the desolation of Jerusalem. As my colleague, Mr. Lawrence, said last night, I profess to have some knowledge of the city of New York. I was born in that city, I have passed all my days there, but I do not claim any thing upon that ground, except the opportunity for observation and knowledge which so long a period of time has afforded; and I say from the fullness of that knowledge that I am astounded at the audacity (I use the word in no offensive sense to the gentleman from New York) I say I am astonished at the audacity of the statements made respecting that city; assertions, the boldness of which, are to be accounted for only by that unhesitating confidence which usually accompanies the want of knowledge. The eloquent gentleman [Mr. Curtis] began his discourse with a dissertation upon the nature of civil government, particularly as applied to cities; and he told us that so far as this measure was concerned it was not a question of right, it was not a question of principle, but that it was a question of expediency. When we demand a recognition in the fundamental law of that right of municipal government which has grown out of the experience of two thousand years; which survived the despotism of the Roman empire and the feudal trammels of the middle ages—that burgher liberty for which the free cities and guilds contended against emperors and nobles, we are to be told, in a republican government, that it is not a question of right, that it is not a question of principle; but purely a question of expediency. Why, sir, one-half the wrongs that have been imposed upon society have been introduced and justified under the color of the word 'expediency.' How long, sir, may I ask, must a measure endure before it will ripen into a right and become a principle. The right of municipal bodies to have the exclusive management of their own affairs has existed for two thousand five hundred years. The Romans, the greatest law givers the world has ever known; the people who have left us the greatest and most systematic body of legal principles, that were ever brought together within the same compass, conceived nothing, carried out nothing, and transmitted nothing more important to posterity than the regulation they established by which separate cities and towns had the right of choosing their own magistrates and of enacting their own laws. They transplanted that political principle to the soil of Britain and from it the Saxon derived their political division of the country into counties, townships and hundreds. It was the germ in fact of that division and distribution of political power, which is the essence of our form of government, and which has proved to be the best security for the protection of the rights of the individual and for the preservation of political liberty. This is one of the great fundamental principles upon which republican government rests and every departure from it is a step toward despotism, for the diverging lines by which political society moves is on the one hand toward liberty and on the other to centralization, aristocracy, monarchy and finally to despotism. I say this, sir, in no demagogical spirit. I am not in the habit of making use of public occasions for such a purpose. I speak of it as the truth and as the teachings of history, and I contend that this principle of republican government has been departed from and violated by the course of legislation in this State in respect to the city of New York for the past ten years, and which is sought to be restrained by the proposed constitutional provision now under consideration. The gentleman from New York, Mr. Chairman, says that, New York is not the property of itself. He has painted a picture of that city. He has described it poetically; he has described it geographically and I neither quarrel with the poetry of his description nor with the accuracy of his geography.

Mr. CURTIS—Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I would remind him simply that I am technically "the gentleman from Richmond," and not the gentleman from New York. He has spoken of me, I think, as the gentleman from New York, and I think his statement is therefore liable to create confusion.

Mr. DALY—I apologize to the gentleman [Mr. Curtis]. I presume his mistakes are entirely attributable to the circumstance that he is "the gentleman from Richmond." [Laughter.] I referred to the eloquent gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], but in doing so did not mean to disparage the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins], for he is fully included in my encomium. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would state—

Mr. DEVELIN—I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] has already spoken once.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair will hear what the gentleman proposes to say, in order that it may decide whether the gentleman [Mr. Hutchins] is in order or not.

Mr. DEVELIN—My point of order is that the gentleman has no right to speak at all having already spoken on this question.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would say that I apologize to the gentleman—

Mr. DEVELIN—I r ise to a point of order. The gentleman has already spoken on this question.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair holds that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] is not speaking upon the question.

Mr. DEVELIN—If he is not speaking on the question, I suppose I may be allowed to speak again if I do not speak on the pending question. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would ask my friend wherein we differ—

Mr. DEVELIN—I rise to a question or order.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] is in order.

Mr. DEVELIN—Then I hope I will be in order when I ask an opportunity to speak again.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would ask my friend wherein we differ in our argument, when he bases his upon the assertion that the Roman code provided that municipal governments should control in all local matters, and the State only in those matters in which the whole people are interested?

Mr. DALY—I proposed to answer the gentleman as I went along. I was about opening that branch of the subject, and shall approach it immediately. Whether I answer it or not is a matter that will be determined by the gentlemen present. I presume I shall not answer it satisfactorily to the gentleman from New York. My eloquent friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], whom I have now located in a region which may excuse the obscurity of his vision respecting the city of New York [laughter], says that New York is merely the gateway of the State, and that it holds that relation to the State and to the nation, that it has no right to consider any thing exclusive in itself, if the common interests of the State and of the nation are otherwise; that as a great commercial emporium, and a great seaport town, the State and the nation have a right, and it is proper that they should have a right, in its control and management. I do not mean to say, Mr. Chairman, as an integral part of this country, that the city of New York is not a part of the nation, and in the same general sense a part of the State; but it does not follow from this that the management of its local affairs, that all the details of its local government are to be left to the State or to the nation. If the rule of departure is justifiable it cannot be confined to the State, but may extend to the general government, for that is the natural tendency and the logical result of the policy of centralization. Mr. Chairman, when this colony was established, there had arisen in Europe, in the great struggle for municipal liberty (for the history of municipal corporations is the history of political liberty), a practice of granting in a charter, as a special privilege, and not as a right, certain franchises or political liberties to the inhabitants of particular cities or towns. Those charters were obtained by various means, sometimes by force, sometimes by persuasion, sometimes by money, sometimes by that which the gentleman has referred to, political expediency; but whenever, or wherever, or however obtained, they were wrested from the hand of power, taken out of the grasp of some feudal baron or sovereign, and preserved as to title or evidence of the right of the municipality to the privilege granted. When the city of New York passed from its Dutch rulers and came under the government of England, one of the first acts of its earliest governors was to grant one of these peculiar privileges or charters. I call it the grant of a privilege and not the recognition of a right, and therefore, under the Dongan charter and Montgomery charter, to which the gentleman has referred, the city of New York merely had the privileges or franchises which it conferred—she never had the right of municipal government. It depended upon that parchment, and it depended upon that parchment alone. But after the establishment of a republican government in the land, after the overthrow of the colonial power of Great Britain, after the destruction of every vestige of kingly government, and the institution of a republican government, this right of particular localities, whether agricultural or urban, formed into counties, confederated in towns, or aggregated in cities; to govern themselves in matters purely local; whether embodied in charters, expressed in laws or fixed in Constitutions, became a political principle, both in this State and in this country, by its general recognition and wide adoption, and what we ask in respect to the city of New York, is a clear and exact recognition of the principle in the Constitution about to be framed. The gentleman from Richmond asks the question "What is the city of New York?" It is a very comprehensive question, and especially when asked by a gentleman who has lived as long as he has in that city, and a question which he has himself but indifferently answered. He has begun by stating that it is an exceptional city. He lays down this as his fundamental proposition. And if he is right in this, then his conclusion follows that, being an exceptional city, differing from all other cities under our republican form of government, and differing, as I assume he supposes, from all the other cities of the world, a course of policy is necessary for it that would not be justifiable for any other city. Now, in what respect has he proved this? He says it differs first in this, that a larger number of immigrants coming to our shores, come to that city than to any other in the country. That is true. The great tide of immigration, the great movement of mankind westward which first began on the high plateaus of Central Asia, and which still continues, to be checked only by the Rocky mountains or the waters of the Pacific, comes first to the city of New York and is from there distributed over the vast expanse of our country. It is true that those chiefly coming from the Eastern Hemisphere have their first resting place in the city of New York. But what is the next fact stated by the gentleman? It is that the larger and worst portion of this immigration remains in the city of New York. He asserts the fact. I deny it. My denial is as good as his assertion, and I put him to the proof by statistics. He then proceeds to say that the largest and worst portion of this immigration, which comes to and remains in the city of New York, is intensely ignorant and criminal. I deny it; and as I said before, my denial is as good as his assertion. I have, Mr. Chairman, to give weight and force to my denial, what the gentleman evidently has not, some sympathy with, and some knowledge of the class to whom he applies the epithets "ignorant and criminal"—a knowledge, sir, not of to-day, but which has extended over my whole life, for if there is any thing, now that I have passed the meridian of life, that is a source of satisfaction to me, it is that I have kept up my association with, my interest in, and my sympathy with, the humble class from which I sprung. I therefore profess, Mr. Chairman, to know something of the people who have immigrated to and settled in the city of New York; and allow me, as the child of two of them, to tell the gentleman from Richmond that, in their unpretending virtues, laborious lives, and honest purposes, they have contributed more to the advance, prosperity and greatness of New York than the cultivated and refined, to whom the gentleman probably thinks the government of that city should be committed. I profess, moreover, Mr. Chairman, to know something of the statistics of great cities, and I make the assertion that the city of New York, whether compared in respect to the ignorance or the criminality of its population, is not, in proportion to its numbers, below the standard of any other city in the world. I do not speak of the cities of Asia, about which I have no particular information; but I do say, when compared with any of the great cities of Europe, London or Paris, or, to take a closer comparison, the industrious and commercial city of Glasgow, and the city of New York, if we take as a test that general intelligence and orderly conduct of its people, the number of children who attend school, the number of persons that can read and write, or any other test, is upon an equality, if it be not above the standard of any of the cities named. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in commenting upon the exceptional character of the city of New York spoke of it as admirably adapted for commerce. He referred to the two rivers on either side of it, to its picturesque position, and, in his glowing eulogy, outdid, in the enumeration of its marvelous advantages, the Biblical description of Tyre. Did it occur to the gentleman that there was something else besides its natural advantages, which had led to its rise and extraordinary prosperity? Has he taken into account how its interests have been advanced and its wealth increased by the tide of immigration, which for the last half century has flowed to this country, and which is the secret of our rapid and unexampled development? It was a remark of Bacon that that people were the most enlightened, and destined to make the greatest advance in civilization, who did the most to encourage the people of other nations to settle amongst them; and we are a signal proof of the sagacity and wisdom of the observation. It is these immigrants, the residuum of whose vice and ignorance is deposited, according to the gentleman, in the city of New York, that have made that city and the county what it is. Why, sir, what is the history of this country? It is but the history of immigration, from the first vessel that landed at Jamestown or Plymouth or the last ship-load of immigrants that came from Belgium or Ireland—a movement which began with the discovery and settlement of this country, which has steadily gone on and will end only with its full and final occupation. It is only narrow minds or little minds that cannot see this, and which carp at and dwell upon the injurious influence exercised upon our institutions by the immigrant and the stranger. The gentleman, if I rightly understand him, regarded immigration, in itself, as, upon the whole, beneficial to the country, but the drawback upon it, in his estimation, was the residuum of ignorance and vice which concentrated by reason of it in the city of New York; it was that which in his estimation, made it, an exceptional city, substantially a foreign city, subject to all the vices and ignorances of the class of persons who came to and had control there. I will answer the gentleman by the simple statistical statement that it appears by the last census that in the city of New York the native outnumbers the foreign population; that the majority of its inhabitants are not foreigners but native born, and this I submit is an ample answer to the charge of the foreign character of the city and to the insinuation that it is ruled or controlled by foreigners. The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], relying upon the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins], that there are forty thousand arrests made in the city of New York of persons over the age of twenty-one years, assumes as a conclusion that those persons are all voters—that is if I understood him correctly—that these forty thousand criminals are all voters. Sir, we have a registration annually of all the voters of the city of New York. I do not pretend to remember exactly the number registered, but it is my impression, confirmed by inquiry of a gentleman present, that the number does not exceed one hundred and thirty thousand, and of this number the gentleman would convey the idea that forty thousand are criminals! I am glad that the gentleman resides in the county of Richmond; for, though not very remote from the city of New York, that circumstance may excuse the want of knowledge that warrants the audacity of such an assertion.

Mr. DEVELIN—He resides where they burn hospitals and lay sick people out upon the ground.

Mr. DALY—I am not surprised that my eloquent friend has never represented the city of New York, entertaining such sentiments as he does respecting its inhabitants. I do not think I misrepresent—I certainly do not willingly misstate—the obvious conclusion to be derived from the gentleman's assertion. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are, according to the statistics, eight hundred thousand inhabitants in the city of New York, and, if out of its one hundred and thirty thousand voters, forty thousand of them are criminal, and that ratio is taken as a test of the whole population—the non-voters, the women and the children—why, sir, the city must be worse than the cities of the plain, for the destruction of which God rained down fire and brimstone. Allow me to say, in perfect good feeling, to my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], for he knows I would not say any thing with the intention of being personal, that he belongs to a class who were very prominent about the time of the French Revolution, called doctrinaires. The word signifies a person who does not trouble himself much about facts, but who confidently lays down doctrines or conclusions based upon theories or systems which are purely of his own creation. This is the case with the gentleman when he lays it down as a conclusion that one-third of the voters of New York are criminals. I was not present yesterday when the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] read a letter addressed by me to some gentleman connected with the Senate of Massachusetts, respecting the police of the city of New York. I am sorry I was not present to hear the letter read, because it was written some four or five years ago, and I cannot from my memory now state exactly its contents, and I can give only my general impression, and that impression is this: that I stated that our police force in the city of New York was one of the best of any city in the world. At all events, whether I said that or not, that is what I thought, and that is what I still think. But if the gentleman means to argue that this is attributable solely to the fact of a commission having been established in 1857, by which the police force has been since governed, I beg leave to differ with him. It is a favorite mode of argument to infer from the existence of one thing that another has been the result, and in this way leap to a conclusion; and the gentleman consequently argues that the efficiency and excellence of the police is due entirely to the existence of a board of commissioners. The efficiency of the police, in my judgment, arises from several causes, the first and most important of which is, that the members of the force are appointed during good behavior, a principle which we contended for in respect to the judges when the report of the Committee on the Judiciary was pending. It is the fact that they are not appointed for a certain number of days, or months, or years, and that, whatever they may have been before their appointment, or whatever motive, political or otherwise, may have led to their selection, their continuance in office afterward depends entirely upon their good behavior. That is one of the best features of any police system, and it is a most important one in the city of New York. The next fact is that the police are organized and made efficient by a system of drill and of constant instruction in respect to their duties and are known and distinguished by an official badge and by a uniform; that they do not go about secretly and stealthily in the city, but publicly and openly with the insignia of their office upon their person. And, thirdly, that the discipline to which they are subject gives them the efficiency and power of a military organization when they are required to act collectively in times of public danger. It is instruction, discipline, and the esprit du corps of a body of men holding by the tenure of good behavior, that makes them the efficient force they are, and not the fact that the vote of the majority of the members of the Legislature determine who the four gentlemen shall be who as commissioners are to be at the head of the organization.

The section reported by the committee provides that the mayor of the city shall appoint these commissioners; and I contend that it is more appropriate that this power should be vested in the municipal head of the city than in the members of the Legislature or in the Governor. The causes which I have enumerated, and which led to the efficiency of the police, were in operation before the control of that body by the appointment of commissioners was transferred from the city to the State. One of the most important of the reforms in the system was requiring the policemen to wear uniforms and subjecting them to drill and military discipline, and this was due to the untiring efforts of a public spirited gentleman, James W. Gerard, Esq., who persistently advocated it through the newspapers, at public meetings, and upon all occasions. It met with the greatest opposition, especially on the part of the existing police force. It was contended that the uniform would be a badge of servitude and was inconsistent with the nature and the spirit of our republican institutions. It was a great struggle to obtain it, but through the persevering efforts of the gentleman referred to it was obtained, and it was the first great step to make that force what it is. I say that the efficiency of the police is mainly due to the discipline I have referred to; to the fact that they are clothed in uniform, and above all that they are appointed during good behavior, and also to the fact that it is an organized department, with commissioners at its head whose past labors and efforts I am far from undervaluing; but I ask the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Richmond [Messrs. Hutchins and Curtis], and I ask any gentleman upon this floor, if it is necessary for the management and efficiency of the police force of the city of New York that the commissioners should be appointed, as they are now, by the members of the Legislature, or as they were formerly, by the Governor? Do the members of the Legislature who reside in different parts of the State, or the Governor who resides here in Albany, know the wants of the people of the city of New York better than those who live there, or are they better able to judge of the fitness of the persons who should be the commissioners of police than the mayor of that city? Obviously, they are not. It is not, therefore, a public but a political reason which has led to the adoption of such a course. What are the facts in regard to these commissions? Not designing to speak, I have not provided myself with the information essential to a full exposition of this subject. I have hurriedly put down, as near as I can recollect, the number of commissions existing in the city of New York. They are twelve in number, and I will repeat them. The police commission, the health commission, the excise commission, the Central park commission, the tax commission, the street cleaning commission, the Broadway pavement commission, the commission of public records, the commission of charities and corrections, and the Croton aqueduct commission, and of these the commission of charities and corrections is the only one appointed by a local authority, the comptroller of the city.

Mr. E. BROOKS—There are several others that the gentleman [Mr. Daly] has not mentioned. There are the commissioners of pilots and the commissioners of emigration.

Mr. DALY—We have always regarded them as State officers.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Then there is the Harlem bridge commission.

Mr. DALY—Yes, I had forgotten that. I will begin with the street cleaning commission. Does the Governor, who is at the center of the State and occasionally comes to the city of New York, know best whom should be put at the head of the department for cleaning of the streets of that city? Does he know better than the mayor of the city, or the people who are there?

Mr. HUTCHINS—The gentleman [Mr. Daly] is in error. The street cleaning commission consisted of the mayor, the corporation counsel and the comptroller. I believe that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin], who was corporation counsel at the time the street cleaning commission was appointed, was a member of that commission, and signed a contract for cleaning the streets. The commission was composed entirely of local officers.

Mr. DEVELIN—Mr. Chairman—(Is any body going to call me to order?) [Laughter.] The commission of which the gentleman speaks was composed of the mayor, the comptroller, the corporation counsel and the city inspector. I was corporation counsel at that time.

Mr. HUTCHINS—Did not the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin], as a member of that commission, join in making a contract for cleaning the streets?

Mr. DEVELIN—No, I did not join in the contract. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALY—The gentleman may be right. I will take it as he states it, but I will substitute in place of the street cleaning commission the audit commission.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would ask my colleague [Mr. Daly] if he denies the statement of my friend from New York [Mr. Develin]?

Mr. DALY—I admit the correctness of his statement, and I put in place of the street cleaning commission the audit commission which makes the number the same. Now, I do not propose to enter into this matter in detail. I have not been here during the principal part of this debate, and it would be unjust to gentlemen of the Convention to repeat what may have been already said by others. I will therefore simply say that this mode of governing by the establishment of commissions is not in accordance with the principles or past practice of our republican institutions. The fact is, that nearly the whole of the executive part of the municipal government of the city of New York is in the form of commissions organized under special laws, passed by the Legislature, and the persons who are administering these laws are either named in the law or they are appointed by the Governor of the State or appointed by a vote of the Legislature. This is a feature which characterizes the whole system, and I say it is anti-republican. It is opposed to the whole plan of our government, and its inevitable tendency is toward the centralization of political power. It is for this reason, whatever may be its present operation or effect, admitting all that is claimed for it, that I am and shall ever be opposed to it. No doubt the majority of the members of this Convention, are of the belief that the political opinions entertained by the bulk of the people of the city of New York are wrong and exceedingly injurious. I do not quarrel with gentlemen who entertain this opinion but simply suggest to them to allow the people of the city of New York the same right of independent judgment that they exercise themselves. Political opinions are subject to mutation and change. Toleration is therefore quite as necessary in politics as in religion, and it is a poor way to convince the people of the city of New York of their political errors, by taking away from them their municipal rights. But toleration is more extolled as a precept than enforced as a practice; and I have no doubt that this conviction that the majority of the people of the city of New York are in a state of political error, induced a belief in the necessity of their being governed by those of opposite political opinions rather than to allow them to govern themselves. That would seem to be the reason, and the chief reason, why the acts creating these numerous commissions were passed, or if their enactment was caused by the belief that by such means the majority of the people of the city of New York might be induced to change their political opinions, the result has shown that it has produced exactly the opposite effect, for the democratic majorities, have steadily increased in the city of New York from year to year and with each increasing commission, so that so far as that remedy was relied upon it has proved to be any thing but an antidote. It has failed and must always fail in its final results, for every violation of a great political principle for a partisan advantage is, as a stroke of political policy, always a mistake. Mr. Chairman, I have a word to say respecting the riots upon which the gentleman from Richmond has commented, and as to the extent which the government of the city of New York, or its people, are answerable for what occurred. I was present at the riots, and saw with emotions never felt before, and which I trust I shall never feel again, many of the scenes which took place. I might say much respecting it were it not that, with the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker], I consider the subject of the New York riots wholly out of place in this discussion. The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] says there is something exceptional in the city of New York. I can with equal appropriateness say that there was something exceptional in these riots. We were in the midst of a civil war, and whatever may have been the cause of the riots in the city of New York, they were bad enough and painful enough, but not worse than riots which have taken place in other cities equally as large and under circumstances equally exciting. The state of feeling which produced them, existed, not merely in the city of New York, but in other parts of the State, and to a greater or less extent in every town and city in the country. The city was left with but limited means to protect itself against such an outbreak. It was left with a small but brave body of police, aided by a single company of United States infantry, and no body of men ever distinguished themselves by greater intrepidity and fidelity in so trying a crisis. There were many causes operating, and one of them which operated very largely in producing the feeling which resulted in the riot, was the inequality in respect to the draft. The law provided that the man who could not pay three hundred dollars for a substitute must go to the army if drafted. I think that did more than any thing else in its effect upon the minds of the working classes, and if I had been a working man at the time, with a wife and several children dependent upon me for support, I will not undertake to judge how I may or would have felt. It was very well for persons like myself to have been patriotic and active in support of the government, having the three hundred dollars to procure a substitute, but I do not set myself up as a judge of those who had it not. Nor is what occurred during the riots to be taken or urged as an argument against the foreign element in the population of the city of New York. That element was not found wanting in the country's hour of peril, and I will submit this satisfactory proof of it. I have been connected with an institution organized from the commencement of the war for the support of the orphans of the brave men who have fallen in defense of the Union. That institution was the first one established in the country. It was established in the city of New York, but has latterly been removed to Deposit in Delaware county. It contains at present one hundred and ninety-seven orphans, a part being half orphans. The result of my own observations as an officer of that institution is that the largest portion of these orphans are the children of foreigners. They are the children of men born in other lands, who came to this country and laid down their lives for the preservation of our institutions. These children have chiefly come from the city of New York, and the fact that about two-thirds of them are the orphans of foreigners may be taken as some evidence of what the foreign element of New York did in the support of the government. I would say, in addition, having seen a great deal of what occurred in the riots, that it appeared to me that the rioters were led by soldiers. I have seen and read enough to enable me to know a soldier by his acts, and I am confident that many of the men who led the riots were soldiers, though whether rebel or Union soldiers I do not know.

Mr. AXTELL—The gentleman, in his remarks, says that, from his observation, he is of the opinion that the rioters were led by soldiers, but whether Union or rebel he does not know. I would ask if any Union soldiers were convicted of having participated in this riot?

Mr. DALY—The question put by the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Axtell] would imply that there might possibly have been Union soldiers. I said I could not say whether they were rebel or Union soldiers, but that they were soldiers I have no doubt. I have no knowledge which enables me to answer the gentleman's question; but I know that much of the riot which I saw was not a spontaneous movement, but was guided and led by men of military capacity. I know, from what I saw, that a mob can be led almost as effectively as a company of soldiers. This was one of the peculiarities of that riot, which made it so disastrous in its consequences and so difficult to suppress. The gentleman referred to the fortunate circumstance of the arrival of two regiments of Union soldiers, as if that was the means by which the riot was first checked; but a more fortunate circumstance than that, at the most fearful period, was the falling of a heavy shower of rain at about two o'clock in the morning, but for the occurrence of which the city might have been the scene of a terrible conflagration. This grateful and penetrating shower calmed the excited multitude and sent many to their homes who would otherwise have continued in their work of destruction. I have now said all I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Richmond. In conclusion let me urge the gentlemen of the Convention not to be led into an erroneous impression respecting the city of New York by statements that have been made. I bid them remember, in the language with which Junius referred to the city of London, that "the great metropolis is the life blood of the State, coursing from the heart, and infusing itself into every vein and artery of the national constitution." What it asks is to be guarded and protected in those municipal rights enjoyed by every other city in the country. It asks for a constitutional provision which will protect it against the invasion of any political party now or hereafter, which may happen to be in power in the State. There is a deep-seated feeling in the city of New York upon this subject. Those who constitute the political majority there feel that in insisting upon the preservation of their municipal rights they are contending for a great principle. They are not battling for themselves alone. It was well said by the Irish orator, Curran, that, "in the confederated strength and united counsels of great cities, public liberty finds a safeguard that extends itself to the remote inhabitant who never put his foot within its gates;" and this is the case here, for the principle for which they are contending lies at the very foundation of our republican institutions. If their just and reasonable demand is not complied with, then I say to you, gentlemen, this Constitution will never be adopted. I say this not as a threat or as a menace. The fear that a Constitution will be rejected is no reason for putting in it what should not be contained in it. But when the thing asked for is itself right, it is proper to refer to the consequences that will follow from the refusal to recognize and grant it. A member of the majority said to me yesterday, we cannot give up the power of the State over so large and so important a part of it as the city of New York. That is, we must have here at Albany the appointment of the heads of the departments, or commissions, to which have been committed almost the entire control and management of its local affairs. If this is to be the construction, then I say that, not only will the entire vote of the political majority of the city of New York be cast against this Constitution, but all the intelligence, influence and power of that majority will be exerted to secure a similar result throughout the State. We ask for nothing that is unreasonable or unjust. We ask for the permanent recognition of a right as old as the days of Alfred, and one that has been essentially American in its wide operation and effect.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I move to strike out "three" and insert "two" in the third line, and to correspondingly insert "two" instead of "three" in that section.

Mr. HARRIS—I hope my friend from Cattaraugus [Mr. Van Campen] will withdraw his motion. It was announced by the gentleman who made the motion now pending, to strike out the first section, that he made it with a view that this should be a test vote; and I hope it will be so regarded by the Convention. It has thus far been discussed as being a test question. There are several amendments which will be proposed to the first section if this motion should not prevail. I am aware that a motion to amend the section has precedence over the motion which is now pending; but I hope no gentleman will insist upon amending the section until this test vote shall be taken. If this vote shall prevail, the whole article goes out; if it should not prevail, then we shall have opportunity and occasion to amend the various sections in the article. I intended to propose, if we should come to that question, several amendments, myself—but I hope no gentleman will interfere with the motion which has been made, and which has been discussed for several days, to strike out the section, but that it will be regarded as a test question.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—If the motion were now to be taken on striking out this section, I should vote against it. I made the motion upon the assumption that this Convention had decided not to pitch this report out of the window, but take the responsibility which is upon this Convention to perfect and improve the report of that committee in such a manner as would meet the views of this Convention, and pass it. It was with that view that I made the motion; but if the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] desires it, I will withdraw the motion to amend in that regard for the present.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be upon the motion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] to strike out the first section of the article.

Mr. ALVORD—I desire to say, sir, a few words in relation to some of the positions taken by my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] this morning, and in doing so—

Mr. BICKFORD—The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has spoken on this question once, and if he is to speak again I insist that we shall all have the same opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN—All will have the same opportunity. If any gentleman who has not spoken desires the floor, he is entitled to it.

Mr. ALVORD—I waited for that very purpose, but finding that no one desired to address the committee, rose myself. If any gentleman who has not yet addressed the committee desires to do so now, I trust he will do so, and I will respectfully sit down and wait for him.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. ALVORD—I wish, in the first place, in the opening of the few remarks which I intend to make at this time, to say to my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], that in his conclusion he has done me and the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] a probably unintentional wrong in undertaking to say that we argue only from the position that expediency necessitates our action in regard to this matter. Now, sir, while I have undertaken to argue this matter, not in the narrow way in which I conceive it certainly has been argued mostly upon the side of the opposition; I have distinctly stated that it is a question of principle with me, and what I have said in reference to the expediency of the measure has been only to add weight to the position which I take in regard to this question as a matter of principle. I, sir, would be the last man upon the floor of this Convention—and I trust my acts, so far as they are concerned, from the commencement of our labors up to this time, show me to be such; I would be the last man on the floor of this Convention to forget principle in the light of expediency. If I believed—as I think the gentleman from Richmond honestly in his heart believes—that this would be a violation of the great principle underlying the republican institutions of our country, I would go hand in hand with him in the position which he has taken, and so eloquently argued upon this floor. But, sir, different with him in the very commencement of the argument, my position being diametrically opposite to his on the question of principle, it is only in that view that I take the position that I occupy; and only with the hope of adding effect to what I say; not as a question of expediency, but showing clearly and conclusively that the departure from right will eventuate in the breaking down of party, that we are proceeding in the wrong course, that we are heaping upon ourselves a load that we cannot bear. In the argument of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], he portrayed to us the great sink of iniquity and crime, the city of New York, collecting together from all parts of this world that which is lowest, and vilest, and most degraded; and as the pot seethed and boiled the better portion of it rather than the scum was thrown off upon the great broad field of the country; and that which was the most vile, the most wicked, the most vicious and the most uncontrolable was left in the city of New York. And following up his eloquence in that regard, he comes down to statistics, and he tells us that forty-nine thousand male persons over the age of twenty-one years in the city of New York were arrested in the year 1866, and that it is fair to presume from that statement that at least forty thousand of them were citizens, and entitled to vote—almost one-third of the entire voting population of the city of New York arrested for the commission of crime. And he argues from that position that it is wrong for us to give them the right of local self-government. I go with him there, sir, that it is wrong, if this be true; for it strikes at the very foundation and root of a republican government. I reiterate now what I said before, that if the argument used by the gentleman from Richmond and others who undertake to curtail the power of this local population to govern themselves, is good for any thing, it should not stop where they stop. It should go to the entire disenfranchisement of the whole population of that city from any power or right to control the destinies of this State, even in the smallest degree. If they have not the ability and the integrity to rightfully perform their duties as local governors of their own locality, they have no right to step up to the polls, and thus assist, through their representatives which they may send up here to Albany, in framing laws to govern me and mine. There is no stopping short, therefore, of a wholesale disenfranchisement of the city of New York, making it a province of the country rather than an integral portion of the people of the State. There is no way of stopping short in this road in which the gentlemen are traveling. We have got to do one of two things. We have got to give up the idea of republican government, and the idea of the equality of man so far as that locality is concerned, or else we have got to give to each and every portion of this State the same rights that we grant to any other portion. Our laws, in other words, have got to be common to the whole people. The laws that govern cities should be equal in their action over all the cities of the land. The laws that govern counties should be the same in all counties and so of the laws that govern villages, and there should be no exception by means of which one portion of the State is placed under the domination and rule of another. There has been a great deal of argument here adduced, and undertaken to be introduced here, among others an argument to the passions and to the prejudices of men, growing out of the riots in 1863. Now, I am not going into an extended history of those riots or their causes, but I ask the gentleman from Richmond to recollect the history of this State for the past few years. There has been an organized riot—aye, a rebellion, sir—in more than one or two or three counties of this State that continues to-day even, whenever the opportunity comes for it to show its head, against the government of the State, in the rural portions of the country—in this county of Albany, in the county of Rensselaer, in Columbia, Delaware, Greene and Ulster. You have had your anti-rent riots again and again and again repeated, and the strong arm of the State, through its military power, has gone to the scene of action and driven for the moment the rioters abroad and scattered them; but when that military force had retired, again the riot has gone on. And within a few days, almost within the sound of the bells that toll at your capital, armed men, sir, resisted the force and the power of the law, plain, clear and explicit, and drove the officers of the law from the position that they should occupy as the conservators of the peace and the protectors of the property of the people of the country. Now, sir, here at least in this infected region, in this population so given to turmoil and trouble and riot, there should be an effective metropolitan police, under the argument of the gentleman from Richmond. We leave that matter, sir, where it has been left always in the past. We have our local officers of justice, who are the executors of the law of the State. They are, under ordinary circumstances, sufficient for the purpose, and as we aggregate together individuals in closer contiguity, and as communities become larger in numbers, we increase these executive officers for the purpose of protecting the public peace, taking care of the lives and the property of individuals. We have seen, sir, in the past history of this State, that even with all these precautions in localities where there have not been such great aggregations of people as there are on Manhattan island, that the last resort of the State, the military power of the government, has had to be called upon for the purpose of putting down riot and rebellion. Why, take his own county of Richmond; sir, that county, judging from what he has said upon this floor, standing outside of the city of New York, having a population which could not possibly stay within the purlieus of that infected city, but while they hold their lives in their hands, during the day transacting their business, they could not, let the shades of evening fall before they departed from the city of New York and sought shelter and safety in that spot which was the very haven of their hopes, Staten Island. Does he recollect that there a mob rose up in its might and strength, and notwithstanding the executive power which undertook to control them in that locality, destroyed the property of this State, costing a very large amount of money, and that to this day there has been no remuneration given for that destruction of property in that county of Richmond? And does he not know, sir, that to-day any attempt to establish upon that island any quarantine, by way of protecting the sanitary interests of the people of the State of New York and the city of New York, will meet with an uprising of the whole of that people, regardless of all law or all attempt to restrain them? Sir, arguing from his premises, carrying them out to their correct conclusions, the result must necessarily be as I have undertaken to depict it in what I have heretofore said, that you must have a strong central government here at Albany, a government of power and of force that aggregates to itself all of the power of the people of the State, in order to put down these combinations wherever they may exist in the State, temporarily, a result often occurring under a monarchy or a despotism, or else you have got to let these things work out themselves to their legitimate conclusions. Let me say another thing here. He talks about the people, even in this case he talks about the people of the State of New York governing in this regard, leaving alone the question of principle involved here. Let us bring him right down to the test of this. Will he undertake to say, or any other man upon the floor of this chamber, that the whole democratic vote of the city and county of New York is not against these commissions? I take it that no man will answer to that in any other way than in the affirmative, that they are. Take the aggregate vote of that democratic party in the city and county of New York, overstepping the vote of the republican party in the canvass of last year; and take the aggregate vote—the majority of the people of New York State in the rural districts overstepping the democratic vote; and what does the balance show. The city and county of New York give a larger majority than the aggregate majority by which you have elected seventy-three members of the Assembly in this State. The democratic majority in that city, larger in number than the whole of this, have elected only twenty-one. Here a minority of the people of this State are represented in the Legislature of the State by seventy-three votes, while the majority of that people are represented by twenty-one. How is it so far as the expression of the people in this matter is concerned? If the majority of the people, speaking through the Legislature, are overcome and entirely controlled by a minority; if this is a republican doctrine, and should be carried out by the republican party; if that is the doctrine of any party in this State, and it is an absolute necessity that I should subscribe to that doctrine before I can be permitted to belong to that party, I cannot, as the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] says, in regard to the matter, I cannot go with the party; I must diverge from it. But I have undertaken to state here, and I reiterate it, that at no time, as I understand it, in the history of this State, in the past party politics of the State, has this ever been considered as a cardinal and indispensable plank in the platform of the republican party. The ultimate tendency of all such attempts as this to interfere with what has been always unquestionably the idea in this State, and in this nation, to centralize power, to take it away from the body of the people, and have one great organ and head in the center of the State, or the Union, undertake to control and coerce the people of the country, will sooner or later end either in the destruction of the party who are engaged in the operation, or in the destruction of the republican institutions of the country. So far as it regards the city of New York, it is the pride of the people of the State; it is the pride of the nation. It is soon to become, unquestionably, the greatest point of importance, commercially, within the limits of the civilized globe. It will take care of itself if left alone to itself. Through darkness and danger and trouble and trial all great reforms, all great steps in the progress of the human race, have been made in the past. Any attempt or undertaking to do it directly against principle will eventuate in worse dangers, in worse difficulties, in worse troubles, in worse confusion, than if you permit the matters legitimately to come to their own conclusion. And I say, therefore, in this regard, and I say it without any sort of mistake in my belief, that it is the opinion of a great portion of the people of the State; and I reflect the views of the majority of my party within the limits of my own county when I say it, that if it becomes necessary that New York should go even through blood and fire for the purpose of her redemption, better that that should be done by her own people, better that she should thus be purified as it were by fire, than to violate the great underlying principle of our government, and undertake here away from them, at arm's length from them, to direct and control their affairs. I have no desire that the whole of this article should be placed in the Constitution. I only desire that the principle involved in the article should have a place, a habitation and a name in the Constitution of the country. I believe, sir, that there is no question but that the Constitutional Convention of 1846 believed that they had guarded this to the entire extent that was necessary. They then took the only known political divisions of this State and placed them in the Constitution and declared that so far as those political divisions were concerned, for the purposes of local government, they should be continued. They did not dream, sir, of metropolitan police districts. They did not dream, sir, of the aggregation of small portions of contiguous counties together for the purpose of creating another political division of the State. They had no idea of the ingenuity of man to concoct any such scheme as this. I care not by whom it was concocted, whether it was democrat or republican. I care not whether it received the sanction of all of the people of the locality at the time that it was done. I do not impugn the motives nor the action of the court of appeals who finally decided this question when it was brought up for their review. But I do say that in the light of the experience of the debates of the Constitutional Convention of 1846, in the light of the action of the people up to 1857 in this State, under that Constitution, this was a departure, if not from the letter, from the spirit of the Constitution of 1846. A Constitution is a rigid matter. It has to be explained as it reads by the courts; and the court cannot by intendment take any thing else but what appears upon the sheet, which gives forth the ideas of the party making the Constitution and the people adopting it; and it was under that iron fixed rule of necessity that the court of appeals were compelled to make the decision that they did. If they could have gone into the intention of the Convention, if they could have gone into the intention of the people when they voted for it, we never would have had in any law of this State, supported by the court of appeals, this idea of creating a new political disposition of the territory of this State. Therefore, sir, for that purpose, I desire that this Constitution should be plain and explicit in this regard, that there should be no question in reference to it. If gentlemen see fit to put into the Constitution that there shall be a right, a power, upon the part of the Legislature of this State, to create other divisions than those now known to the law and to the Constitution of 1846, let them come up and put them in, and give their reasons for putting them in. But if they have made up their minds that the frame-work of this State as it has existed in the past is for the best interests of the people, let them say so, and prevent any legislative action by means of which those departments shall be enlarged or diminished. I, therefore, am in favor, if nothing else can be done, if gentlemen think that this long article composed of a great many sections, is too long to go in, and is in reality a part of the work of the Legislature, I am willing, so far as I am concerned, that they shall test this principle, and this only, as contained in the tenth section of the article under consideration, and that is:

"The State, for the purposes of legal government, shall be divided into counties, towns, cities and villages, as heretofore, and no other local divisions shall be made, nor shall any territory be annexed to a city except for the purpose of changing its boundaries."

Now, let us bring that section of this article before us for consideration; then if gentlemen desire any other political districts, any other geograhical arrangement of the State for any future purpose of legislation, and they can give us good reasons therefor, let us put it into that portion of this article. But let us put into this Constitution that there shall not be, on the part of the Legislature, any power to create any other political division. The great mistake in the Constitution of 1846 was not that it was not particular enough, not that it did not state what was its intention in words clear and unmistakable; but they did not state the exceptions; they did not state the limits beyond which the Legislature should not go; and the result is that we have got a crop of State officers in the State to-day in violation of the spirit and intention of the Constitution of 1846. We have got a diffusion of the responsibilities of government here at this locality, because of the very fact that while the Constitution makers of 1846 desired to put into the Constitution all the independent State officers that should be named, to control the destinies of this State, they forgot to say that the Legislature should not go any further; and we have had half a dozen more added to them, independent, irresponsible to the great head of the State department here at Albany. Just so in regard to this question which is now under consideration. They intended clearly that the divisions named in the Constitution should be the only political division; and that for the purpose of local government those divisions should be had; and that local government should be uniform under all circumstances.

Mr. HUTCHINS—The gentleman says that he should be satisfied to take section 10 of the majority report and let it go at that. I would ask the gentleman, if that section was adopted as he has reported it—and it reads in this wise: "The State, for the purposes of local government, shall be divided into counties, towns, cities and villages, and no other local divisions or districts shall be made"—how will he have the election districts made by the Legislature?

Mr. ALVORD—I have stated that and repeated it again and again; but I will repeat it once more for the gentleman. I have stated to gentlemen and to members of this Convention and of this committee, that under this particular section of the article before them, they can go on and amend it so far forth as regards all the districts they desire to have in the State; and there is a gentleman now before me who has this morning expressed a desire to amend this section in the direction of school districts. If the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hutchins] wants to make election districts, there is no difficulty in regard to it. All I want is a platform laid down in the Constitution so that when we come to the end of our geographical districts that will be the end of it, and that there will be no further control over it so far as the Legislature is concerned for the purpose of getting over any emergency that may arise, or any of these little questions that may come along.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would ask the gentleman how he would have senate or assembly districts under that section?

Mr. ALVORD—I would state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] that I an not a lawyer, and I understand he is a distinguished one; that he has already got in his Constitution senate and assembly districts, and that this does not cripple or cut down those districts in any way or shape.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I believe that the section that we have adopted provides that we shall have no assembly districts, but shall elect the assemblymen by counties, and then if we adopt this the Legislature could not change it in any respect.

Mr. ALVORD—That is exactly what I mean, and what the Constitutional Convention have intended to do, to put it so that the Legislature cannot go back to the districting system. We have been quite satisfied that the district system of the Constitution of 1846 was a failure. Does he agree with me that this is taking away the power of electing by districts and putting it in counties? That is where we desire it to be, and that is one of the reasons why I am in favor of putting it here in explicit, plain language that will be so clear that the Legislature shall not go beyond it. We have put it in here "senatorial districts" and "assembly districts," not in the narrow sense of the present use of the words, but a county is an assembly district, according to its population to elect one, two, three, four, five, or more members of the Assembly. Therefore this does not interfere with them at all in any way. Gentlemen must recollect that the composition of the republican Union party of this State is not such as composed in olden times the old whig party of this State; that the larger share of the men of the olden times who arrayed themselves against the democracy of New York were men who have now laid down in the bed with the modern democracy of the present day. The whigs of days gone by are largely the democracy of the present day and among its most prominent leaders, and the republican union party has an element of democracy in it, so far as regards the old political position of its members, largely in ascendency over any of the political element of its founders. Commencing in 1848, coming down through 1854 and 1856, finally culminating in the rebellion, there have large numbers of men, heretofore acting with the democratic party of the State of New York in its days of purity, who are now acting with the republican union party. And that class of men, very large throughout this State, in all its localities, put themselves upon the old democratic doctrine of "equal and exact justice to all men," as my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] has said, repeating my words, giving to no one locality superior advantages or privileges, political or otherwise, over another locality; placing no greater or heavier burden upon the people in one portion of the State than upon any other people. Believing in the doctrine that if the people shall be educated as they should be in every republican government under our wise and beneficent laws, they will, sooner or later, raise this people to the position of being entitled to govern themselves, as well as the best men among us; believing in the progression of the human race, I believe that, although they may come over from other countries and throw themselves upon us—a population steeped in crime and in infamy—that the water that comes from our fountains, and that the fresh air that flows over our hills and over our valleys, will, if it does not regenerate them in the old trunk, make shoots to come forth, that will be among the best and the ablest and the noblest of the land. We have examples here upon this floor of that kind. We have examples all over the entire of our State and our nation. Out of this mass of corruption there will come forth—there must, under the genial influences of our institutions, come forth—some of the very best men and best blood that ever blessed any nation. Corruption is merely for the purpose of reproduction of that which is good and great and beneficent and benevolent. I, therefore, say to these men again, that so long as they shall give the right of suffrage to the people of this country, to exercise it in the general government of the country, in its elections for President, Governor and other officers, they should not undertake to deny it in local matters so far as regards one portion of the people and give it wholly and entirely to another portion. They should give the man in the city of New York, living within the limits of the city, as much right to speak in reference to its financial and executive officers as they give a man in the city of Syracuse or in the city of Buffalo. They should make these laws exact, uniform and equal over all portions of the State. And unless they do so—I repeat again what I have once said, and then close—unless they do so, it must of necessity eventuate, and it cannot do otherwise, in the entire disruption of the very foundation upon which we stand as a republican government, or it must drag down to utter, irremediable and hopeless defeat, so far as regards the direction of human affairs, the party that dares to violate this principle.

Mr. GOULD—There are two or three aspects of this article which have presented themselves to my mind, which I have not heard brought before the Convention in the progress of this debate. Those points, therefore, I desire to submit to its consideration. I am spared at the threshold the necessity of entering into any legal considerations applicable to this subject by the remarks which have been made by the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] and the axioms which have been been laid down by the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford]. If I understood those axioms and principles they contain what I believe to be the truth with regard to this matter. I understand those gentlemen to say that the legitimate root of sovereignty is the whole of the people of the State; that it is indivisible, and that it exists in the people of the State alone; that nothing is obligatory upon the citizen unless it is enjoined by the people of the whole State. If, for purposes of convenience, portions of this sovereignty are delegated, for special purposes, to any smaller subdivision of the people, it is only as a matter of convenience. It is only as a principal delegates a portion of his power, for certain specific purposes, to be exercised for his benefit, to an agent whom he selects. And, as a principal may at any time revoke a power that is given to his agent, so may the sovereign people of the State revoke any portion of its power which it has given to a subordinate number of its inhabitants, provided that power is exercised injuriously to the rights and to the interests of the whole people. Such a resumption of its original rights cannot be rightfully complained of by any municipality, and is no invasion of its rights. I understand that this doctrine has been fully admitted by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] and by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. They admit that the cities or the subordinate municipalities of the State, have no rightful power in themselves; that they only have it as it is given to them by the supreme power of the State. And therefore when the question is asked, as it is asked, by one of the minority reports of the committee, signed by two legal gentlemen from the city of New York, what right the people have to interfere in the affairs of the city of New York, I understand that that question ought never to have been asked by such distinguished lawyers as they are—there is no question at all about it. With this preliminary statement, I come to the remarks of the chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris]. I understood him to lay it down as a rule which should never be departed from in the fundamental laws of the State of New York, that there should be perfect and entire equality in all the rules and all the regulations which govern the subordinate municipalities of the State; that it is unjust and wrong to give any sort of power, or to impose any sort of disability, upon one municipal organization which is not imposed upon every other organization in the State. I dissent from this view of the case. When we were boys, we were compelled to go through a course of logic, and we were told in our logic books that one of the greatest sources of fallacy, indeed it is the greatest source of fallacy, was in what is called "the non-distribution of the middle term." The gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] has forgotten the monitions which were impressed upon his mind by the study of his logic book in his youth. This non-distribution of the middle term consists in putting a word or a phrase into one of the terms of a syllogism, and then putting the same word, but used in a different sense, into another term of the same syllogism; and thus the conclusion is irremediably vitiated. The word "equal" has a great variety of significations. We may acknowledge, if we please, that the State should distribute equal justice to all the citizens of the State, and to all the towns of the State. But what do we mean by equal justice? Suppose that the gentleman should desire to have an equality in pantaloons—that he should say that this equality consisted in putting an equal number of yards of cloth in every pair of pantaloons which was manufactured in the State. What would be the result of an equality of this kind? Suppose the pattern standard which he made use of was adapted for the accommodation of the nether extremities of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], I should like to know what my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Corbett] would do under those circumstances. [Laughter]. The very wife of his bosom would not know him. He would not even know himself, sir.

Mr. ALVORD—My colleague has not got any wife.

Mr. GOULD—That is the gentleman's misfortune, then. Or suppose you were to reverse the position, and that you were to make the pattern pantaloons such as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Corbett] wears, I should like to know what the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], or what I should do if we were stuffed like a sausage into its case, into such pantaloons as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Corbett] wears. [Laughter]. Why, sir, no one but a fat man knows the misery that it causes to be incased in a pair of tight pantaloons. No one who has not experienced it knows how terrible it is to have the blood flushing his face, to have the sparks coming out of his eyes, to have all the inclosed abdominal viscera involved in misery, calling forth a wail deep enough to penetrate into the darkness of Hades and awaken responsive sympathy in the stern bosom of Rhadamanthus himself. [Laughter]. I want to know if this is not precisely the mistake that the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] has made; whether he does not say that the city of Hudson, with its small nether extremities should be incased in pantaloons of precisely the same size that the portly city of New York is incased in. The great object, equal justice, with regard to men, is to make pantaloons that will fit them equally. The great object of legislation with regard to equal justice to cities, is to make laws and institutions which will fit them—which shall be adopted to their respective circumstances, so that they shall be equally well governed. We can readily understand that the great city of New York ought to be restrained in some directions by disabilities, which would be entirely unnecessary in the city of Hudson. We can understand, on the other hand, that the city of New York in some cases required powers such as the city of Hudson need not be invested with. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] says that there must be an entire equality, that whatever is granted to one should be granted to another. How utterly unnecessary is this, when we consider that the circumstances of the various cities differ entirely. It seems to me that absurdity can go no further than to say that they shall be treated precisely the same way in regard to legislation in their unequal circumstances and their unequal requirements. There are certain circumstances with respect to which the city of New York differs from all other cities in the State, and all other cities anywhere. In the first place the people of the whole State have an interest in the affairs of the city of New York that they have in no other city in the State. What are the facts of the case? Almost every grain of wheat that is raised in the State of New York, almost every barrel of flour that is ground there, almost every article of agricultural production, every article of manufacture that is made in the whole State, goes to New York for a market. The property of the State lies in the city of New York. It is under the custody of the authorities of New York city, and liable to destruction by their mobs. We are told of the vast banking capital of the city of New York. Why, my neighbors all about me in Hudson, to my certain knowledge, are the owners of stock in the banks and insurance companies of the city of New York. There is not a county nor a city in the whole State whose citizens are not stockholders in institutions located in that city. But my constituents, while they are interested in New York, have no interest in the banks of Troy; they have no interest in the banks of Syracuse; they have no interest in the banks of Elmira, or in any other out of that city. The city of New York, in certain respects, differs from every other city in the Union. The banks of Troy may be robbed with impunity so far as the interests of the people of Columbia or Dutchess are concerned; yet the banks of New York cannot be robbed with impunity without sacrificing my interest and that of my constituents, and that of the constituents of every gentleman on this floor. This is a state of facts which must never be forgotten or overlooked. What is the course of trade? The banks in Corning, the banks in Watertown, the banks in Norwich, in Chenango county, or any other county banks, do not keep their money in their own vaults. Their funds are lying in New York, subject to draft. Nearly the whole banking capital of the State of New York lies in the city, exposed to the incursions of mobs in that city. No county has that interest in the banks of any other county that it has in the city of New York. Their property, their money, is not lying in any other city; but it does lie in the city of New York. And now, shall I be told that although this vast and gigantic city is one in which the people of the whole State naturally have an interest, they shall be cut off at once and forever from any right to rule and regulate their property in New York? Must it be given and remitted wholly over, not to the merchants of New York, but to the resident voters of the city of New York, which is a very different body of men? This reason why it is that New York differs from other cities has been well stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] the other day. The topographical position of the city of New York is very peculiar. It is very long and very narrow. The geological condition of New York is such as belongs almost to no other city but New York. The whole of the surface rock of that city is hollowed out into basins where stagnant water collects; and the soil, when it is removed, discloses these basins as a source of malaria. People who desire to maintain their health are compelled to move out of the city of New York, and to reside in a different place, simply from this peculiarity. Healthy children cannot be reared in that city; and those who desire to have healthy children are compelled to remove from it. Hence it is that New York differs from every other city in the world. Its active, intelligent, and wealthy men cannot reside in it, and therefore cannot vote in it. The citizens of Elmira—those who run its factories, those whose intelligence and intellect furnish employment for its thousands of laborers and artisans—reside in the city and vote in it. So do the citizens of every other city in the State. But the men who make New York what it is—the men whose intellect and abilities gives employment to the working men of New York—they who own its ships, they who are the proprietors of its manufactories, they who use its wharves and warehouses, they who are known and honored as New Yorkers abroad, are precisely the men who have no votes there whatever. They are the men who go into New Jersey, who fill up almost the whole State of New Jersey, who go into Connecticut, who go into the counties of the State of New York lying north of the city, and who do not vote in the city of New York. This makes a difference that no wise legislator can overlook. When we were told, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] does tell us, and I do not think he overstates it, that seventy thousand active business men of New York go elsewhere to sleep at night, seventy thousand of these men have no vote in the city—I say that that circumstance alone is sufficient to prevent any such enactment in this article as is proposed by the majority of the Committee on Cities. It makes it dangerous. Allusion has been made here to the character of the resident population of the city of New York. I do not complain of that city because its inhabitants are mainly foreigners; but what I do complain of, and what I am alarmed at, is this: If the city of New York is the port where all these foreigners enter originally, the enterprising, the active, the intelligent, the moral and the virtuous part of those foreigners, who constitute the best materials of republican government, go to other places. They go to Minnesota and to Iowa, they go to Illinois, they go to populate the great cities of the West. New York is a common sewer, where the worst part of this immigration centers; where the lazy, the idle and the knavish naturally gravitate; and it is because it is that sewer, not because its population consists of foreigners, but because it consists of the very worst part of foreigners, that it should be differentiated from the other cities of the State; and our fundamental law should not compel us to invest it with the same measure of rights and duties as are imposed on the other cities of the State. With these remarks I come to the speech of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. You have not forgotten, sir, the bewildered amazement which came over this Convention when the gentleman announced to it, in facei ecclesia, the other day, that he was a "practical man"—announced what the Convention, in its wildest moments of imagination, never dreamed of before. [Laughter.] Yes, sir, you need not look with such an incredulous eye upon me; that was the very claim he made; those were the very words that he used—"a practical man!" The nervous system of the Convention had hardly been restored to its equilibrium before the gentleman shocked us, almost to the point of consternation, by actually proving that he was a practical man—proving it by the production of a specimen brick, drawn from the "marble quarries of eternity," and written all over with the point of a diamond [laughter] placed on the point of a pen that was taken from the immortal American eagle, which that famous bird dropped last 4th of July over the city of Syracuse, when flapping its wings over that illustrious city. [Laughter.] And now, after this proof of his practicality, he goes on to give us a most remarkable statement, and that statement was that we were to look upon this question of New York without reference to any political considerations whatever. He told us, as he told us again this morning, that this was a question of principle from which all political questions should be very carefully excluded. Why, this a strange idea for "a practical man." A principle is a generalized induction from the facts applicable to it. What is a principle good for which professedly excludes the most important facts upon which it is based? How are you to approach a question of this kind and exclude all political considerations? How are you to elect an alderman or a mayor and exclude all political considerations whatever? It may be very wrong to admit political considerations, but it is human nature to do it. Human nature always did carry political ideas into an election, and it always will. Suppose that we have held up a citizen of each political party, no matter how pure he may be; no matter how immaculate he may be, those who are republicans will vote for the republican candidate, and those who are democrats will vote for the democratic candidate. They cannot exclude from their minds the idea that the election of a mayor will necessarily have an influence upon general politics, and they will be influenced even in the extreme case that I have supposed, by political considerations. But we all know that it is much worse than this, where one very good man is held up, and the other is a very bad one. Each party will support its own party candidate, though he be bad. And they will support him because they are looking forward to political considerations; and they study the influence that he may have upon the success of their party in the long run. We are compelled, by the very necessities of the case, to look upon this with party eyes. What is the effect of the article proposed by the Committee on Cities? You might as well introduce an article into the Constitution enacting that the republican party should never have a majority in all coming time, as to enact the article presented here. There are some of us who are old enough to remember what happened when the old time democratic doctrine was invoked that the citizen was to "vote early and vote often." We know how many fictitious majorities were manufactured in that way; and we know what was the result of ballot stuffing. Suppose that you give to the city of New York full power over the ballot-boxes, to men who are elected by the voters of that city—not by the merchants, not by the men who contribute to its magnificent charities, not by the men who make it honored and honorable as it is, but by the voters of the city. Ballot stuffing would be resorted to now as unscrupulously as it was before the custody of the boxes was given to the police. If it was necessary for the success of the party to have fifty thousand majority, fifty thousand would be given. If seventy-five thousand were necessary it would be equally forthcoming. If a hundred thousand should be necessary they are good for it. We cannot, therefore, as "practical" men exclude the idea of politics. If this is all that comes from being "practical," a man might as well be imaginative; he might as well be a poet; he might as well be the author of the "Potiphar papers;" he might as well be a peddler or an organ grinder.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the PRESIDENT resumed the chair, and the Convention took a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock P. M., and again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Cities, their Organization, Government and Powers, Mr. RUMSEY, of Steuben, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the motion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] to strike out the first section; on which question the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] had the floor.

Mr. GOULD—Mr. Chairman—

Mr. A. R. LAWRENCE—If the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] will yield the floor, I would like to make an explanation. I understand that a remark which I made last evening, with reference to the Fort Gansevoort transaction, in reference to a resolution which was signed by the mayor of New York, was understood as applying to a gentleman who is a member of this Convention, and who was at one time mayor of that city. I wish to state that that remark was not intended to apply to my colleague from New York [Mr. Opdyke]; that at the time that I referred to that transaction I was citing a case from the twenty-third volume of the court of appeals reports, the case of Roosevelt v. Draper which was decided in June, 1861, some six months before my colleague became mayor, and that the ordinance to which I referred was passed in 1852, some ten years before my colleague became mayor. Therefore no gentleman who heard me, and who knew the facts, could have understood my remark as applying to him; but in justice to him, and in order that neither he nor I may be misunderstood upon this floor, I wish to say that my remarks were intended to apply to the Hon. Ambrose C. Kingsland, who was mayor of New York in 1852, and not to Mr. Opdyke.

Mr. OPDYKE—I thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence] for his explanation. I knew he would not intentionally misrepresent me or do me any injustice. I am very glad to know that he has not done it even inadvertently. While on my feet, as my colleague from New York [Mr. Hutchins] has referred to the purchase of the Fort Gansevoort property as a grave wrong and outrage on the city of New York, and as it occurred while I filled the office of mayor of that city, I ask leave to say that as mayor I did all in my power to arrest that transaction. I vetoed the ordinance, pointing out its outrageous character, and denouncing it with as much vigor as official courtesy would permit. It was passed over my veto by a unanimous vote in both boards I think, except the vote of Alderman Dayton. I followed it to the courts, resisted it there, and expressed the determination that the matter should be carried to the court of appeals; and seeing that determination, the party who was pressing this claim desisted from further efforts until after the expiration of my term of office, after which he secured his point.

Mr. GOULD—The chairman of the Committee on Cities [Mr. Harris], in the course of his remarks, was pleased to say that, in his opinion, unless the article prepared by his committee was adopted as a part of this Constitution, the instrument which should be the work of our hands and should be submitted to the people, would be utterly and contemptuously rejected by them. But, sir, he, very wisely, in my opinion, told us that this ought not to make any difference with us; that we ought not to pay any undue attention at all events to questions of that character, but that we should do as our judgments and consciences dictated to us. He said that his preference for this article arose from the fact, and he announced it, sir, with all the oracular and judicial ore rotundo which becomes him so well, and of which he is so great a master, that he believes in the article because it is right. Now, sir, I take issue with the gentleman; I believe that it is wrong. When he told us here that he believed it was right, the reason that he gave for his opinion was that it was equal in its action upon all the municipal organizations of the State. I have combated the idea of equality in that sense in the remarks which I had the honor to submit to the committee this morning. Suppose, sir, that there should be an organization of thieves on the frontiers of this State. Suppose that that class of men should establish a city, say on the borders of Hamilton county. It may be urged, sir, that this is an almost impossible hypothesis, but is it more impossible than the establishment of Salt Lake city would have been considered twenty years ago? Is there any greater inherent improbability of such an organization than there was then that an organization for polygamy would be established at Salt Lake? It is known that the tendency of thieves is to band themselves into aggregations. It is known that very few of them rob alone; that they work in gangs; that they associate together; that they spread a net over all parts of the State. Now, sir, is it absolutely impossible that such an organization may be established, that such a city may be built, that such a city may be inhabited? If that is a possible hypothesis at all, I would ask whether the principles of democratic justice, or any kind of justice, would demand that an organization of that character should be treated as all the other political organizations are treated in the State. It seems to me that the mere mention of that possible fact is sufficient to show us that it is exceedingly unwise to require the Legislature to stretch all the cities upon a Procrustean bed, to prevent it from making any law whatever in establishing a city, which should not apply to every other city in the Union. This consideration alone, ought to restrain us from the adoption of the article. By one of the provisions of this article every city is allowed an unlimited power of taxation. The Legislature has no right to interfere with it, nor restrain this power of taxation. Is that right, sir? Is that proper? May not the liberties of the people be exceedingly endangered by a power of that character exercised without limit and without restraint? We have had an allusion on this floor to the proposal by Mayor Wood to establish a free city in the city of New York; to cut it off from its connection with the rest of the State, and make it an independent free city. If this article is adopted what is to prevent the carrying out of that idea if it should suit the majority of the city of New York to do so? If you allow them to assess an unlimited amount of taxation, may they not raise troops, may they not provide themselves with munitions of war? May they not levy upon the property which the people of this State are compelled to lodge there for exchange in the marts of the world, in order to carry out this idea? And yet gentlemen are willing to place this power in the hands of the voters of the city of New York. How would they feel, sir, if they were cut off from the only port in their possession which enables them to communicate with the rest of the world, and were compelled to pass with their produce through a foreign, at all events, and it may be through a hostile territory? It seems to me that the people of the State of New York ought to pause before they insert in their fundamental law an article giving these powers. The gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] and the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] have told us that invariably and at all times the law has only recognized the division into counties, into cities, and into towns and villages, and that these subdivisions are all that the law has ever known. Well, sir, this is not true; but supposing it were true, is there any thing sacred about a county, or a town, or a village? Is the existence of these precise subdivisions in any way essential to liberty or security? Would any man's liberty or property be endangered by their alteration or their destruction, if there should be any valid reason for doing so? These were organized many years ago for public convenince, and public convenience alone; and when King Alfred made these divisions of territory there were smaller divisions also. He not only established these divisions which have been enumerated by these gentlemen, but he further subdivided the towns and villages into hundreds, and into tithings. Well, in the course of time these smaller subdivisions were found to be unnecessary for the purpose they were designed for, and they were quietly dropped. What is there to hinder—if the convenience and the interests of the people of the State shall demand it—what is there to hinder them from changing these organizations, if by such change they may promote the convenience of the public? I see none whatever. But, sir, there have been other divisions known to the law. What is the school-district but a subdivision which is known to the law and recognized by the law? But if this article shall be passed it breaks up some of the very best organizations in the State. Where two counties lie contiguous to each other there are many school-districts whose territories extend over both sides of the line; but when this article is passed all these union school districts must be broken up to the great detriment of education; because they cannot operate in territory which forms a part of two different political organizations. I think we ought not to do this. The school-district is a very important part of our subdivisions. The right of self-government is exercised by them, they have the power of taxation, and it has been done with great convenience to the people, and without any objection from any portion of the people, so far as I know.

Mr. CHESEBRO—That is a matter of amendment merely.

Mr. GOULD—I am speaking of the article itself. The question is now upon striking it out. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] tells us that towns are all equal by the law, and that cities ought to be equal also; but, sir, that does not follow. The towns of the State of New York vary very slightly with regard to population. They are very much alike in circumstances; there is very little to differentiate one town from another. General laws may be perfectly applicable to them, when they would be entirely inapplicable to cities where the circumstances are so exceedingly various. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] startles us again by the remarkable assertion that "there is yet a little germ of democracy" in the republican party. Et tu Brute! [Laughter.] Does the gentleman really mean to tell us—he who has been long our trusted and honored leader—does he mean to tell us that all that is left to us is a "little germ" of democracy, that we have not the whole plant developed, but only a little germ? Sir, I am surprised at this insinuation. I had supposed that the republican party owed its origin solely to the pure spirit of democracy. I supposed it was conceived and brought forth in democracy, and that its cradle had been rocked there. I supposed that the whole object of the republican party was to extend equal justice and equal rights throughout the whole Union, which is all the democracy I know any thing about. If the republican party is not devoted to that idea, surely its mission is useless, surely its pretentions are most outrageous. I regret that the gentleman should have cast such an imputation as this upon the party with which he is associated, and hope it may not foreshadow his deserting it.

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman give way a moment? The gentleman must have been very thick of hearing, or I must have been very unconscious of what I was saying, if I undertook to utter such a sentiment. I did not use the word "germ" at all. The very words that I used were these: "that the republican party, as at present constituted, was largely democratic; democratic from its origin, in 1848, up to this time, and that the whig party which composed the opposition to the democracy at that time had gone over to the modern democracy, and composed a large portion of it. That is what I said.

Mr. GOULD—That may be what the gentleman meant to say, but here I wrote it down, at the very instant that it fell from his lips, and those are the very words that I wrote down. "There is a little germ of democracy left in the republican party."

Mr. ALVORD—I did not use that language.

Mr. GOULD—I do not know how the stenographer has it, but that is the way that I wrote it down, and that is the way that I understood it.

Mr. ALVORD—I hope the gentleman will take it now as I said it—as I now say I said it.

Mr. GOULD—That is all right. I take the gentleman's statement as he now gives it, and am very glad to hear it. But, sir, the gentleman opposes the real idea of democracy. He is in favor of taking the sovereignty away from the whole people, and it is only democratic when it is exercised by the whole people. He proposes to take it away from the State, and to give it inalienably to cities; to delegate the power of the whole people to a certain portion of them, a power which may be, and often is, exercised injuriously to the interests of the State. Sir, this is not democratic, and it is because it is not that the republican party fight against it. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] says, also, that this idea of commissions is based upon a loophole in the Constitution which was overlooked by its framers and by the people who accomplished it; and, sir, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] said that it was sustained by an evasion of the Constitution. Now, sir, this is a hard measure to mete out to us. I do not understand that it—

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I do not see the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] in his seat, and beg leave to say that I remember that the gentleman from Onondaga was very particular in saying that it was an evasion of the Constitution by the Legislature and not by the courts. The expression that the gentleman has used would lead, I fear, to the impression that the gentleman from Onondaga said it was an evasion by the courts.

Mr. GOULD—I did not mean to say so. He said it came in by an evasion. Where does the evasion come in? The section of the Constitution under which this comes in is in the tenth article, second section. I will read it:

"All county officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of the respective counties, or appointed by the boards of supervisors, or other county authorities, as the Legislature shall direct. All city, town and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose. All other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed, as the Legislature may direct."

Now, here was a vast power lying upon the hands of the members of the Convention of 1846, which they must distribute somehow. They had no sort of idea of excluding this or any thing else. They had this vast power lying upon their hands, and they distributed it without much forethought or consideration. They had no fixed idea. The debates of that Convention show that they had no fixed policy with regard to this matter. The contemporary history shows the same thing. Here, then, is a division of powers which they make; but they naturally and evidently thought that cases might arise, that contingencies might happen, which were not met by the specific provision which they had laid down. They expressly anticipated cases of this character, and they say that when such cases do arise, then the officers thus arising shall be elected by the people or "appointed, as the Legislature may direct." There is nothing plainer than this. What were the circumstances? In consequence of the great growth of cities it was found that it was necessary to have more efficient sanitary regulations than they hitherto had; and it was found necessary to have more efficient police regulations. They found, on examining the matter, that it was impossible to have adequate sanitary provision for the city of New York unless the contiguous city of Brooklyn was included also in its provisions. It was found that it was impossible to have an adequate police establishment unless that city was also embraced. The large and populous village of West Troy, lying on the other side of the river from Troy, is almost a suburb of that city, and almost belongs to it. How could you have an efficient police in the city of Troy unless the same police arrangement was extended over West Troy also? It was impossible to carry out the idea which the Legislature had in its mind; it was impossible to meet the beneficent intentions which they had toward those cities, unless this contiguous territory was included. And what was the most natural and most obvious method of carrying out that idea? It was to unite them in the form of a district—unite them in some other form than that of the city, village or town. It was perfectly natural, perfectly proper, that they should do so; and if they did so, then precisely this contingency arose which the Constitution has provided for. The Constitution then steps in and declares that the officers for such district shall be appointed in the manner prescribed by the act. Here was no evasion, sir, of the Constitution. It is absurd to call it an evasion. It was perfectly natural and just; perfectly proper and constitutional, and commends itself to the good judgment of every section of the State. It was no evasion of the Constitution, it was introduced through no loophole. Now, sir, leaving the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] I have a word or two to say in reply to the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks]. He says, sir, that the police, this new police, does not prevent robbery; that its members are inefficient; that they do not accomplish all the people of New York have a right to expect at the hands of a police. I am aware that a great deal is going on in New York which might and ought to be repressed, but if I am correctly informed—and I have taken a great deal of pains to inform myself—the fault does not lie with the police so much as it does with the police justices who are elected by the people. The police weary themselves with complaints to the authorities. They arrest men and bring them before these police justices; but, sir, if the men thus arrested are of the right political stamp they are at once let off. I have been told by police officers that they are deterred from doing their duty, that they have grown weary of the work, simply because their labor has been rendered altogether nugatory by the action of the police justices. If the action of these police justices is an evidence of what would occur if the appointment of the police was given to the mayor and authorities of New York, the property holders of New York may well tremble at the consequences. The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E Brooks] tells us of the vast charities of New York. Sir, I honor and respect those charities. I acknowledge them. Yet the gentleman misrepresents the case exceedingly when he says that those who contribute to those splendid charities, for which New York is famous, are the persons who do the voting of New York. Sir, the large amount of those splendid charities is contributed by men who have no votes in the city of New York, men who reside in New Jersey, Connecticut, and the counties of the State north of the city of New York. These men have their residences there, and they do not vote in the city. These charities are not to be credited to the voters of New York, although they may be credited to men who do their business in that city. The gentleman goes on to tell us of the riots in the city of New York. He admits that those riots were outrageous. He does not defend the loss of life which occurred there, and the loss of property, and all the outrages which were inflicted upon women and upon children. But he goes on and tells us that riots occurred in other cities. Suppose they did—was there ever a riot of that degree of malignity in any other city? He makes an equation. He puts on one side of the equation the riots of New York, and on the other side of the equation he puts the Jerry riots in Syracuse. Sir, I was astonished at that equation. I was astonished at that balance of the two instances. What was, sir, the Jerry riot? A poor colored man was carried on a cart through the streets of Syracuse, and the brutal officer in charge was beating him as he lay there, to prevent his outcries and his struggles to escape; and the humane people of Syracuse, seeing this, rushed upon that officer and rescued poor Jerry Is there any parallel whatever—

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I do not undertake to stand up here as the advocate either for one side or the other in that case; but the gentleman must acknowledge that I have the privilege, from the position which I occupy, of knowing more about that transaction than he does; and I say that his statement in that regard is entirely untrue. This man Jerry was taken by the officer from a salt block. The moment he was taken by that officer then commenced the cry going through the streets that he was taken under the fugitive slave law. The employer started the cry in the first instance, and the mob followed the officer and succeeded in rescuing the negro, who was not beaten by the officer in any way, shape or manner.

Mr. GOULD—I have been assured by three or four parties that were eye-witnesses of the fact that he was beaten with a cart-rung.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I was present in that town at the time, and I corroborate entirely the statement of my colleague [Mr. Alvord].

Mr. GOULD—Was the gentleman an eye-witness of the whole transaction?

Mr. COMSTOCK—No, sir; I did not see it.

Mr. GOULD—My authority was a very distinguished and very excellent citizen of Syracuse. He may be mistaken; but, at all events, it was the instinct of humanity in Syracuse that prompted that rescue, and not the instinct of brutal violence and riot. I do not know all the circumstances. It may be that I have been misinformed, but if I am informed correctly, I think it is an honor to Syracuse rather than a disgrace to it. I, sir, am a Quaker, and therefore disapprove of fighting. I am a coward, also, and afraid to fight; but if the circumstances occurred as I have stated them, and if I found I had absolutely mingled in that mob and shared its dangers, I should have a higher respect for myself than I ever did in my life. There can be no sort of parallel between the mob in Syracuse that rescued Jerry and the mob in New York that destroyed women and children. Now, what is it that is proposed to be done? To wipe out all the commissions which have been established in the city of New York at one fell swoop. You begin by destroying the emigration commission. If there was ever a commission which was a work of mercy in this State it has been that one. That had not a republican organization, nor a republican origin. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] who has a seat upon this floor, was its father. He was a member of the Legislature of 1847 when it was incorporated. He begged for it, he plead for it, as did a great many other democratic leaders of the city of New York. I have never heard that in any single instance the commission for emigration has been denounced by any person whatever. All who have spoken of it have spoken of it as a ministration of perfect mercy and perfect benevolence. What good would be done by exterminating a commission which has done so much for suffering humanity? If this is destroyed, the old robberies which were committed on the immigrants will be renewed to-morrow.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The Convention of 1846 was democratic. It is not a city institution.

Mr. GOULD—I think it is. Good lawyers concede that would be destroyed in this article. I may be mistaken in that, but it would certainly strike out the police commission. And what has the police commission done so very bad that it must be thus summarily disposed of? The gentleman from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence], last evening told us that he believed the whole State was opposed to it. His colleague from New York [Mr. Daly] this morning corroborated his statement. But we hear from other gentlemen from New York upon this floor, that this is not the case; that the merchants, the tax payers, those who are most interested in the practical working of the police commission, are exceedingly desirous to have it continue. We hear from the life assurance companies of New York—they who are more interested in sanitary matters than any others—they unanimously beseech us to continue that institution. The fire insurance companies, who are more interested in the management of that matter than any others, unanimously petition us to continue the fire commission. They are citizens of New York whose voices we ought to hear, and they prove that there is not as much unanimity among the citizens in their antipathy to these commissions as some of these delegates assert. But if there is this violent antipathy to the commissions in the city of New York, why is it that we have heard no petitions? They certainly cannot be so very much annoyed by them, or they would have besieged us with petitions to change it. But we have heard nothing of that kind; they do not hate them enough for that. Then the excise commission will be blotted out of existence. What will be the result of that? We are told that the excise commission of New York effects the following good objects: First, that the effects of the metropolitan excise law are exhibited in the habitual quiet and orderly manner in which the New York elections are conducted. Can any body deny that that has been the result of the establishment of that body? Can it be denied that the elections of the city of New York are vastly more orderly since the establishment of that board than they were before? It has largely increased the balances to the credit of the poor in our savings banks. Is that any thing injurious? Has that result of the board ever been denied on this floor by any gentleman whatever? We are told that it has produced "a diminution of arrests for disorder and crime by the police, who formerly made more, but now make fewer on Sundays than on any other day of the week. That during the thirteen months in which we have not been prohibited by the courts from giving effect to this law, the total number of arrests on Sundays by the police, for offenses resulting manifestly from too free indulgence in the use of intoxicating drinks, was 2,514, while on the Tuesdays of those same months it was no less than 6,021, or more than double the aggregate of arrests in the corresponding Sundays. That this disproportion is wholly new to our city's experience, as under other laws there were more arrests on Sunday than on any other day of the week. Thus, in the eight months of 1865, from May to November, inclusive, there were 3,515 of the arrests made on Sundays, and but 3,380 on Tuesdays." When we are told that the number of criminals have been diminished one-half by the operation of this law—2,514 in place of 6,021—what are we asked to do? By the enactment of this article we deliberately declare that this diminution of crime shall cease. The blood of these men will be upon our heads. Are we prepared for this? Are we prepared deliberately to enact iniquity into a law? We shall do so if we pass this article. It seems to me that the statements which have been made here, undoubted statements—statements which cannot possibly be impeached—show us that the welfare and the interests not only of the city of New York but of the whole State are involved in the continuance of these commissions. They have certainly produced improvements wherever they have been established. The present organization of the fire department has diminished the loss by conflagration in the city of New York to a very great degree. They do their duty more cheaply; they do it more efficiently. The establishment of it has prevented a great deal of crime and rowdyism which formerly ran rampant in the city in all the fire engine houses throughout the whole length and breadth of it. Now, are we prepared to go back to this? Are we prepared to consign the citizens of New York to the terrible inflictions which they suffered previous to the establishment of these commissions? If we are not, let us devise a better system. Let us let well enough alone. Let us, until something is done by these institutions worthy of bonds or of death, encourage them to continue in the path that they have usefully trodden. This only seems to me to be the object of a statesman; this only seems to me to be the object of a true patriot, a sound citizen and an enlightened Legislature. Let us seek to improve rather than to overthrow, and the fruits of good government will develop themselves in increasing abundance, giving peace and comfort to the people, and vindicating genuine democracy from the opprobium which the abuse of the principle has brought upon it.

Mr. LAPHAM—This discussion has taken a very wide range. I do not propose to follow the example of the gentlemen who have preceded me, by entering into any lengthy discussion of the various topics which have been adverted to. I do not intend to examine this question with reference to the effect I suppose it may have on the future of the republican party or of the democratic party. I regret that the gentlemen engaging in the discussion should have taken into consideration topics of that character. We are here to make the fundamental law for men of all parties and of all professions. We are to make a law which is to be administered whether the one party or the other shall be in the ascendency in the State, and we ought to found it upon correct principles with reference to the philosophy of government itself. The city of New York participates in all the affairs of the government of the State. It is represented in the legislative branches of the government. It participates in the choice of the Executive of the State, and of the judicial officers of the State, who are chosen by general ticket. It takes its proper part in the framing of all the laws by which the citizens are governed. The same law of property which protects you and me protects every citizen of the city of New York. The same law which is administered in a court of justice in the county of Albany or Ontario is administered in a court of justice in the city of New York. And the same instrumentalities which are required for the execution of the laws in one portion of the State are presumed to be required for the administration and execution of the laws in every portion of the State. If I understand the views which have been expressed by many gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject, and entertained the views which are, according to my reading, embodied in the article before us, I would be in favor of shutting out the city of New York from participation in legislation. I would carry the idea out, and let the city of New York make its own laws, frame its own government, and take care of itself; for that seems to be the central idea which enters into the minds of gentlemen who favor the adoption of this article. But nothing of that kind can be tolerated; nothing of that kind is permissible. We have adopted an article in which we have clothed the Executive of the State with the power and charged him with the duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed. Under the provision of that article of the Constitution, it will be as much his duty to see that the laws are executed in the city of New York, or in the city of Buffalo, or in the city of Syracuse, as in any of the rural districts of the State.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I would like to inquire to what article the gentleman refers?

Mr. LAPHAM—The article in relation to the Governor and his powers and duties.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I am a little surprised at the statement.

Mr. LAPHAM—It is as much his duty to see that the laws are executed in the city of New York as it is to see that they are executed in the county of Ontario. And whatever instrumentalities are necessary to enable him to execute the laws in any locality, he is bound to employ for the purpose of their execution. And whatever instrumentalities the Legislature from time to time may regard necessary to enable him efficiently and successfully to administer the laws, the Legislature should, in its wisdom, provide. Now, the fundamental difficulty with this first section which the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] proposes to strike out of this article, is this; let me read: "The chief executive power in cities shall be vested in a mayor." What is the meaning of this language? This is to become a part of the Constitution of the State. "The chief executive power in cities shall be vested in a mayor." But this is not all. The section proceeds: "He shall take care that the laws are faithfully executed." Now, adopt this section, let it become a part of the fundamental law of this State, and what condition of things will be presented? How long will it be before the Governor of the State of New York will be brought into collision with a half dozen mayors in different sections of the State? There is occasion for executing the laws in the city of New York. The mayor may issue his proclamation for his mode of executing them; the Governor may undertake to execute the laws as he shall think proper, and a collision will result at once. I will not impute to the honorable gentlemen who compose this committee, for I am not supposing any thing of that kind to be possible, that they had any design or intention to create this state of things within the bounds of the State of New York. The difficulty is inherent. It is impossible to undertake to regulate any portion of the State as an independent locality or jurisdiction, by virtue of the Constitution of the State, without running upon this difficulty at once. It cannot be done.

Mr. CHESEBRO—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Digitized by Google

Mr. LAPHAM—Certainly.

Mr. CHESEBRO—Is it not now the duty of every mayor, including that of the city of New York, to see that the laws are faithfully executed?

Mr. LAPHAM—Yes, sir; but it is not the chief executive power which is vested in any mayor. There is the trouble with the provision. It is not now a constitutional power vested in any mayor. There is the difficulty. It is the duty of the sheriff of every county to see that the laws are faithfully executed, but it is not a constitutional duty over which the executive has no control. It is not a duty in the exercise of which the ex cutive cannot control the sheriff. The Constitution of the State, so far as it provides for the execution of the laws which are enacted by the Legislature, must deposit in one hand the power to control the execution and administration of the laws. If we undertake to subdivide it—if we undertake to place a portion of it in the hands of one body of men, and another portion in the hands of another, and to have it supreme in each, that moment we run into the very difficulty which I have suggested; and that difficulty is embraced within the terms of this first section of the article. There is another reason why I am opposed to the provision of this first section of the article. I am opposed to it by reason of the tremendous power which it invests in the hands of one man in each of the cities of this State. The condition of the mayor of a city is vastly different from the condition of the governor of the State. The mayor of the city is the choice of the entire locality over which he is clothed with jurisdiction by the provision of this section. His power is absolute by the common consent of the entire body of the people residing within the jurisdiction within which he is to exercise his powers. It is not so in relation to the administration of the affairs of the State. There are checks and balances in the administration of the State government to operate upon the minds of the executive in the exercise of the power with which he is clothed by the fundamental law. One county has a political influence in one direction, and another in another. There are balances; there are restraints; there are admonitions; but you clothe the mayor of the city of New York, or the mayor of the city of Buffalo, or the mayor of the city of Syracuse with the entire power of appointing all the subordinates who are to execute the laws within that city; you give the absolute power which is contemplated by this article, and it is a power in view of which gentlemen should pause, in my judgment before they vote upon it or decide to confer it on any single individual.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I would like to ask my colleague another question. How much more power does this confer on a mayor than is conferred by the plan of the canal committee, of which my friend is the chairman, upon the superintendent of public works?

Mr. LAPHAM—I hardly think the question of my colleague deserves a serious answer. I hardly think it is propounded in seriousness, and with the expectation of receiving an answer. There is no analogy between the cases. The whole powers and duties of the superintendent of canals, are to be regulated by law. The Constitution simply creates the office. His powers and his duties are to depend upon the will of the Legislature, but here, the fundamental difficulty is that the chief executive power, by the Constitution, is to be vested in a mayor, and that the mayor by the Constitution, is to be charged with the execution of the laws. I have looked through the other reports—the report of the minority committee, and the report of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], and I see that they have carefully drawn some portions of the sections recommended by them with a view to avoid this very difficulty to which I have referred. Indeed, in the report of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], there is a succinct and careful statement of these very evils, and of the arbitrary and tremendous power with which this article is to clothe a single individual, in case it shall be adopted. It is for this reason—the inherent difficulty of engrafting in the fundamental law any power with reference to a particular locality in the State, and with reference to the exercise of the functions of government by officers in that locality—which constitutes the difficulty in the way of incorporating in the Constitution any thing upon this subject. I do not now say whether or not these commissions which have been referred to, are wise and beneficent in their operation. The mode in which we should reach that, if there be any objection to their existence, is by placing in the Constitution proper restrictions upon the exercise of legislative power with reference to localities such as cities and incorporated villages. There is no difficulty whatever in placing in the body of the Constitution such a check as shall restrain the exercise of legislative power for any improper or partisan purpose with reference to municipal affairs. I concede, in its entire length and breadth, the propriety of the doctrine that with reference to all municipal affairs, a city should be left to manage its own concerns precisely as a town or village manages its affairs. I do not claim that with reference to those matters which are purely municipal in their character, it is proper for the Legislature or the State to undertake the exercise of those functions. I would not send to the city of New York a commission to clean the streets or keep sidewalks in order, any more than I would send such a commission to the village of Canandaigua, where I reside. But so far as the administration and execution of the general laws of the State are concerned, those laws in which the people of the city of New York participate precisely as I do, which they help enact precisely as I do—with reference to the means necessary, I repeat, for the execution of those laws—I would have the supreme power of the State the only power which is to be concerned in their administration. There is no safety in placing that power anywhere else. There is no security or propriety in putting that power anywhere else. If a district, as has been suggested, becomes an anti-rent district, I would clothe the Legislature with power to send such instrumentalities there as should secure obedience to the law. If the city of New York, or any other city, contains elements which make it necessary to send something beyond the ordinary constabulary force which is provided for the purpose of aiding in the execution of the laws, I would have that force sent by the power and authority of the State. The city and county of New York elects a sheriff precisely as the county of Ontario elects its sheriff. Adopt this first section of the article in your Constitution, and what power would the sheriff have in the city of New York? None whatever. He is entirely overshadowed, and his power may be overcome by the supreme power which is vested by the Constitution of the State in the mayor of the city. Again, if it be proper to put in the fundamental law provisions such as are contained in this article, then another thing follows. It follows, as a necessary consequence, that that power which has been reserved to the Legislature through all our history thus far to alter, modify and repeal, if necessary, any or all of these charters, is impliedly taken away. I would not abdicate the supreme control of the State in reference to any of these general matters. If the charter of New York, or the charter of Syracuse, or the charter of Buffalo, needs to be changed by legislative action, I want that power preserved in the Legislature. Now, adopt the theory which has entered into the minds of those who proposed this article, and that power is impliedly taken away, at least it would be improper to exercise it.

Mr. GRAVES—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LAPHAM—Certainly.

Mr. GRAVES—Suppose the mayor of the city of New York should fail, from want of power or from unwillingness, to see that the laws were properly executed, does that article in the Constitution take away from the Governor the power of seeing that the laws are properly executed?

Mr. LAPHAM—Probably not. I have never argued or attempted to argue that it did. But suppose the mayor of New York should undertake to execute the laws in a way that he saw fit, and suppose the Executive of the State should undertake to interfere in his way of administering them, I ask the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], under these two provisions of the Constitution, one vesting the chief executive power in the mayor, who is charged with the execution of the laws, and the other placing in the Executive of the State that power, how is that question of conflict to be determined?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND — This article determines it, and gives the chief power to the mayor.

Mr. LAPHAM—Well, who can fail to see that the necessary and inevitable result of the adoption of this policy is to open the door for perpetual conflict between the officers of these municipal governments and the executive power of the State. Now, I am opposed to the provision of this first section which renders the mayor ineligible, though that objection perhaps could be obviated by an amendment. I see no propriety in such a provision as that. I cannot see any wisdom in it. If it is proper to vest in the mayor of a city, by the Constitution of the State, the chief executive power of the city, the power and duty to see to the execution of the laws, and he administers the government wisely and well, I do not see why the people should not be at liberty to continue him in his place. The very interposition of this clause in the section presupposes that the power with which this officer is here clothed is a dangerous power. Whoever drew this section had in his mind the idea "here is a man clothed with tremendous power, and it will not do to allow him the opportunity to be elected for a second term, by reason of the power which he thus exercises." In other words, this provision is virtually a confession of the danger of the power with which this officer is to be clothed. Now, sir, it seems to me that this whole theory of undertaking to regulate and establish the powers and duties of the various officers of cities by provisions in the fundamental law, is an erroneous theory of the system of government under which we live. It is a departure from our theory of government. We should have but one Constitution. This provision virtually creates two Constitutions, one for the city and another for the State at large. We should have but one. We should have but one authority, clothed with the chief executive power to administer the laws of the State. Unless we subdivide the State, as I have suggested, and give the power to legislate separately, to separate departments, it seems to me that this necessarily follows. If this be so, then I suggest to gentlemen who represent the city of New York, and who are sensitive in regard to the multiplicity of these commissions, that the wise and proper mode of disposing of this question is to incorporate in the proper article of the Constitution, the one in relation to the powers and duties of the Legislature, such restrictions as may be proper, to prevent the unjust exercise of legislative power with reference to the municipal affairs of these corporations. With reference to the general affairs of the State, with reference to the execution of the laws of the State, it will not seriously be claimed by any gentleman upon this floor that the mayor of a city should be charged with the discharge of that duty, or that it is his right or privilege to have any thing whatever to do with it except as a citizen of the State. It is enough to say to him, "You participate as a citizen of the State in the making of these laws; your rights, your property, your person are protected in their administration; that is all you can claim; but in reference to your municipal affairs we give you entire control; that is a matter which belongs exclusively to you." This, in my judgment, is the true line of distinction. If it be so, sir, then it does seem to me that all this effort to incorporate affirmative provisions in the body of the Constitution, clothing the officers of cities with definite and specific powers, is a dangerous attempt, and one which, if successful, will subdivide and break up the unity of the government of the State. With reference to these commissions, I have no definite judgment in respect to them. In regard to the main commissions, particularly in regard to the police commission, which is the most important one of all, I have understood that the operation of that commission has been acceptable to the people of the city. It may be so, or it may not; at all events, it is no new thing in its application to cities, as I believe has been already suggested by gentlemen during this discussion. The city of Baltimore has a like number of commissions applied to it; the city of London is under a like number of commissions. It is a mode of administering the general laws within the localities of cities which is not now adopted for the first time, or new, with reference to the administration of affairs in the city of New York. But as I said before, whether these commissions are wise or unwise, in my judgment this is not the proper way in which to get rid of them. The proper mode in which to get rid of them is for the gentlemen who come here from New York (as was said by the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] last night) and solicit the appointment of these commissions, to turn their attention to prevailing upon the Legislature to reverse their action, to reconsider their determination and to take away from the city of New York those commissions which have not worked acceptably or well. The remedy is there. The great city of New York, sir, has an overshadowing influence in the affairs of the Legislature of this State. It has now control of one branch of the Legislature. If there is any injustice in this legislation, there is no difficulty in the way of its being corrected in the ordinary manner in which unwise laws are repealed. It may be corrected precisely as the charter of the city is from time to time, and I dare say annually, modified and changed by acts of the Legislature. There is no trouble about that, but there is very great danger in the opposite theory, as I have already said, and I beg to repeat, in conclusion, that if you undertake to engraft upon the Constitution affirmative provisions of this character you build up the cities of the State as separate and independent sovereignties, and you subdivide and destroy the unity of the government of the State.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—I do not intend to make much of a reply to the remarkable quibble of the gentleman who has preceded me [Mr. Lapham of Ontario]; but certainly it is one of the most astonishing quibbles that I have ever heard in a deliberative body. The mayor of a city is only designated in this article as the chief executive officer of a city, and the gentleman presumes here to tell us that the chief executive officer of a city could set up his authority against the chief executive officer of the State, the Governor, whenever such officer saw fit to enforce the laws of the State in a city. This is specious and fallacious. Cities and counties are only parts of the State, and its chief executive officers are all subordinate to the Governor when executing the laws of the State, which are supreme. He insinuated also that even the chief executive officer of a city comes in conflict with the chief executive officer of a county, the sheriff, and that with this provision in the Constitution the sheriff of the city of New York would be unable to serve a writ in the discharge of his duty. This argument is equally illogical and fallacious, and I will here take leave of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] and his remarkable quibble, without another word of reply. Mr. Chairman, I believe, with gentlemen on this floor, that the time will come when the Legislature of this State will repeal, if they so desire, the laws which have been passed since 1857 establishing these commissions in our cities. But I fear a far worse state of affairs than the simple repealing of these commissions—I fear retaliatory legislation? As a lover of good order—as a believer in good government, I do not wish to see any retaliatory laws passed in this State. For "two wrongs" the old adage says "never make a right." I do not wish to see members from the cities which have been trampled upon for the last ten years by these commissions, meet together as the country members of the Legislature have met together for the last past ten years to manufacture districts and commissions for the country. I want this strife to stop just here. We are getting in the majority. The light is breaking in the east. We see daylight. We see that the time is coming when we can apply the same thumbscrews to the people in the country that they for the last ten years have applied to us, when we can administer to them the same medicine which they have administered to us; and malicious or revengeful men would say "God speed the time." I say no. Every lover of good government says no. Every true lover of the glorious Empire State says no. Stop this exceptional, this special legislation just here. Put a clause in this Constitution stopping it forever. Why when the democracy get in the majority in the Legislature some poor frozen out democrat from St. Lawrence or Washington will come and say to us "we want a commission for Washington and St. Lawrence counties, we want them united together under a commission." "Why?" "Well those men are bought and sold like cattle at every election, and it is the duty of the democracy to reform those miserable criminals. We must have a commission." "But it is not right. It is an evasion of the Constitution. It won't do." "Yes but they gave it to us when they had the power, now let them take a little of the hot soup which we have had poured down our throats for the last ten years; though it be hot they must take it." [Laughter.] Some men would say make them take it. I say no; let it stop just here. The time is coming, thank God, when it will be in our power to administer the same nauseous medicine to the country parts of the State that they have administered to us, but I do not wish to see it done. What a state of affairs it would be to continue in this great State of New York! What a state of affairs to be transmitted to our children and future generations—the cities fighting the country and the country fighting the cities from year to year! Let us erase these foul blots upon our statute books, and let us resolve to have no more of them to disgrace and defame us. Let it stop just here, sir. Now, in regard to the justice of this commission system, and the motives for its adoption. Let me read you some strong republican testimony of the Hon. Lyman Tremain. I will read it all except the poetry; that I think is bad. [Laughter.] Says this bright and shining republican light at Tammany Hall, in the fall of 1857:

"That you may clearly appreciate the object and purpose of that legislation, you have a right to take into consideration the contemporaneous history of the times and the circumstances by which the republican party found itself surrounded. It found itself besieged by hungry swarms of needy adventurers, who were clamorous for their reward. Many of them had hoped that with the election of John C Fremont the national treasury would be under their control, and the patronage of the general government would be used for their benefit. In this hope they were happily disappointed. Their only chance, therefore, was in the proper dispensation of power and distribution of patronage at Albany. The question that presented itself to the republican leaders was, what shall be done for these patriotic soldiers of fortune, and in what way could power be used to crush out the democratic party? On looking over the State, the most desirable point of attack that was discovered was your own great and noble city. The city of New York ought to have been regarded as eminently entitled to the protection and favor by every true son of the State whose name she bears. Rich in her commerce, her enterprise, her wealth and resources, with patronage equal to that of some of our smaller States, with her merchant princes that have contributed to render the name of an American citizen respected and honored wherever the American flag was carried—it could scarcely have been anticipated that such a city should be selected for hostile legislation by the State she had done so much to honor and strengthen. But unfortunately for her immediate interests, yet fortunately for her future fame, New York in the great contest of 1856 had remained faithful to the Constitution, and declared that the Union should be preserved in all its integrity. She had refused to yield before the fierce storm of fanaticism that swept over the North. True to her antecedents, and recognizing no North, South, East or West, but only one common country, she had rolled up a majority of 25,000 for the democratic candidate for President and Vice-President. For this the decree went forth from the republican leaders that she must be humbled—for these reasons it was determined that the patronage and power which belonged to her people should be transferred to the central power at Albany. For this, it was resolved to create a swarm of new officers to manage her affairs and eat out her substance, to invade municipal rights and to crush out her democratic strength. In vain could your devoted city appeal to her accidental masters to spare her this humiliation. The decree was executed, the work was done with all the skill and success that ability, ingenuity and reckless partisanship could accomplish. Your people, in the exercise of their unquestioned rights, had elected a mayor and democratic city government. An act was passed amending your city charter, so as to turn these democratic officers out of office before they had served out one-half their terms. You had a police force consisting, perhaps, of eight hundred officers, the control and appointment of which from the organization of the government, had been exercised by your own authorities; this power was taken from you and transferred to a metropolitan police board consisting of five new commissioners, to be appointed by the Governor and Senate; the whole police force of the city, with the power to move and appoint, and all this vast patronage that was conferred on this board. Four of the five commissioners appointed under the law were republicans, and the fifth was an American. Thus the majority of the board was selected from a political party that contained less, probably, than one-quarter of the electors in the metropolitan police district. But while the power of selecting your commissioners and your police force was thus taken from you, yet the privilege was left that you should foot all the bills for their support. The funds for this purpose are directed to be raised by tax upon the real and personal property situated within the newly created district. So, too, they created at Albany and appointed a board of commissioners of the New York City Hall, but it was left for the people to raise the sum of $200,000 to pay the interest on its cost. An act was passed, too, in relation to your board of supervisors. It is made to consist of only twelve members, who are elected by general ticket, only six names being voted for by each elector, and the six persons receiving the highest number of votes, with the six persons receiving the next highest number of votes composed the board. Thus, although the democratic party may carry nine-tenths of the wards and four-fifths of the popular vote, their right for power is nullified by the presence in the local Legislature of an equal number of members elected by the minority. By the same act the mayor's veto is annihilated, and, notwithstanding this veto, a majority was authorized to pass the act or ordinance vetoed. If this is a salutary principle of legislation it would seem strange it was not applied to Onondaga or St. Lawrence, or other counties where the republicans have majorities in the board. But I need not enlarge upon this subject. It is enough that your attention is drawn to it. For acts of legislation no more arbitrary and oppressive England lost her American colonies, and at another time England's king lost his head. Democrats of New York, we of the interior have heard your appeals to us for aid. Those appeals have met with a cordial response. We sympathize with you in your wrongs, and we have resolved to fight this battle with you, hand in hand, and shoulder to shoulder together, 'sink or swim, survive or perish;' we will stand or fall together."

He left us in eighteen months after that [laughter], and a long and loud shout of joy went up from the democracy when he did so. We rejoiced that such an arch traitor had left the wigwam. [Laughter.] I read these remarks merely as a little authority to show that this is a partisan commission—which I believe has not been fully asserted here before. I was sorry to hear that my friend and colleague [Mr. Murphy] did not say that it was a partisan commission; but at the time of this trouble I believe that he was our resident minister at the Hague, so that he probably knew very little except what he learned from the public press, of what was occurring in the county of Kings or in the city of New York. If the idea was to give us a good non-partisan police there was no necessity whatever of making a police commission, there was no necessity of forming a metropolitan police district. The charter of the city of New York, the charter of any city in the State, could be so amended that a non-partisan police could be elected by the inhabitants of the State, but they could not wait until an election should take place. There were too many hungry men hanging on the outskirts of the republican party which had just then been defeated, and they had their police bill drawn up and passed by the Legislature here at Albany, and the commissioners were appointed and they immediately set about appointing their subordinates. I have not a word to say in relation to the brave and efficient men who figure in the metropolitan police. I felt pleased and proud to hear the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] say that this was a "great police." It is a great police force. I have had a great deal to do with it officially. I have seen a great deal of its efficiency, and I give it the credit of being one of the best police forces in the world, in some particulars, but in others it is a perfect failure. Its detective system is a most miserable failure. To see the police upon Broadway, to see them escorting the Japanese embassy or any distinguished arrivals, up or down Broadway, one would naturally be impressed with the grandeur of the force and would come to the conclusion that it was one of the finest police forces in the world. And it is for any such purpose. That force is able to quell a mob, too, as rapidly and as well as any police force in London or Paris can do it; but its detective department, I repeat, is a failure, and I think that every one who has any knowledge of the subject will agree with me that there cannot possibly be a greater failure anywhere than the detective branch of the metropolitan police. I have heard and I know of a great many instances in which it has failed. I suppose the great fault of that branch of the metropolitan police force is that its detectives are all known. Those detectives talk and brag of their positions so that every one knows who is a detective and who is not. Now, it is universally conceded by all policemen and by all who know any thing about the organization of an efficient police force that the Austrian police is the best that the world has ever seen. There it is an offense for the detective, a shadow, as he is called, to tell that he is such. He shadows his victim, follows him, traces him, finds out all about him, but when the arrest is to be made it is done by an ostensible officer and not by the detective. In that way detectives live and die in Austria unknown to the people generally. And the Austrian police system is always the same. It makes no difference whether Silesia is a province of Marie Theresa or whether Frederick the Great rules it, neither Frederick the Great nor Marie Theresa makes any change in the police system. It has remained for centuries as it is now. Secret, sudden, efficient and only occasional inklings of its operations become known to the world and that is generally from persons who have been subject to its surveillance. The metropolitan detective system is a failure, and it is so, as I have said, because the detectives go about telling who they are, making friends with thieves and arranging with them to divide the plunder. Why, it would astonish the members of this Convention if I should relate half of what I know in relation to the workings of those detectives. I will give one or two instances. The navy yard in Brooklyn was robbed of nearly $300,000. The purser of the yard was removed by the authorities at Washington. Detectives came on from Washington, and officers came also, I believe, from Philadelphia and Boston, and engaged with other officers in the city of New York in attempting to find out about this robbery. Nothing was discovered, however, until three years had transpired, when it was too late to indict the parties, and then it was proven satisfactorily before a congressional committee that the robbery was instigated by detectives in the city of New York, men whose names I could mention here if it were necessary. It seems that an impression of the key of the navy yard safe had been taken five or six years ago from the room of the purser, who at that time lived at the Mansion House in Brooklyn. That impression of the key had been kept by the thief that had taken it, and in the mean time he had been sent to State prison for some other felony, so that in order to get at this impression they had to get the man pardoned out of State prison at Sing Sing, and they made an arrangement with him that he was to receive a portion of the plunder. That man's name is well known. He was pardoned out and brought to the city of New York, and he, together with other persons, some of them detectives in the city of New York, robbed the safe in the Brooklyn navy yard, and all received certain portions of the money. I will mention another case. The Bethel Bank, in the State of Connecticut. One night the thieves went into the quiet little village of Bethel, in Connecticut, dug away the foundation of the bank, and took away all its money—every thing clean. A reward was offered by the bank, and its president came on to see the detectives in New York, who did not think the reward was sufficient. The reward was made larger. The next day a man came to the head-quarters of the police then in Broome street, with a mysterious black bag containing all the money and effects of the bank. The matter was dropped, and none of them were either arrested or convicted. Another instance. The Concord Bank of Massachusetts was robbed. The bank offered a large reward, but the police thought it was not large enough. But the bank officers were obstinate, and refused to offer a larger one. The case was not "worked up," as it is termed, and was suffered to lay slumbering for nearly three years. Finding that no larger reward could be obtained, the police at last awoke, and one bright summer morning the officers of the bank were sent for; they came on from Concord, and found all their stolen bonds in the hands of the metropolitan police. The detectives said that they found the money and bonds in a glass jar between the low water and high water mark in the Delaware river, in the State of Pennsylvania. For this robbery no one was convicted. Old Mr. Lord, of the city of New York, was robbed of nearly two millions of dollars in bonds. He was very obstinate, and would not offer an immense reward, insisting that the government should "make him good," as he called it. He insisted that the government should pay him the amount of his bonds, the numbers and amounts of which he had registered. But there was great delay; he could not get his bonds, nor would the government pay him for them or issue new ones; and after two or three years he concluded to give one hundred and fifty thousand dollars reward. He was told that that was not enough, that two hundred and fifty thousand dollars was the figure. He refused to give that sum, and after some time had elapsed he was told in the street something like this: "If you don't give that figure those bonds of yours will be burned up this day," and Mr. Lord, with tears in his eyes, had to accede to their terms. Why, sir, the detectives of the city of New York live in the most magnificent style imaginable. There are detectives in that city to-day, I am informed, who are worth hundreds of thousands of dollars, and their names can be mentioned when it is necessary. I recollect another case. There was taken mysteriously from the desk of Mr. Leonard W. Jerome over $30,000 in bonds, and after some time, very mysteriously they came back I have before me a list of a few of the many robberies that have taken place recently in Wall street and its vicinity—clear cases of stealing, no forgeries whatever; no cases of hypothecated stock, no breaches of trust, no confidence operations or defalcations, but fair, square robberies, committed by men who are professional thieves, and who do not deny that they are such, and as such not a few are known to the community as well as by the police. In this list there is much matter for reflection—much more that might lead to comment. At or in the following houses mentioned, the moneys named have been stolen from their counters:

Central National Bank,	$69,000
White & Moens,	5,000
Spark,	10,000
Bliss & Co.,	50,000
Mechanics' Bank,	4,000
Belmont,	25,000
Vermilyea & Co.,	10,000
American Bank,	40,000
Bank of Commerce,	25,000
do do	5,000
Union Bank,	5,000
Lyons & Co.,	5,000
Adams Express,	2,000
Bank of North America,	1,000,000

In casting the eye over these figures, the reasonable question that arises to the mind is: was none of this vast amount of stolen cash or bonds recovered? To that I say, yes; there was probably a loss of fifteen per cent. In police parlance, it was pretty well nearly all "worked" back by a sort of paleography that takes time to study, although easy to comprehend. For instance, the million dollars represented stolen was not in greenbacks, but the representation of greenbacks—bonds and stocks, that to the owners were worth that amount, but would only bring to the thief the price of waste paper in Ann street. That stock, bonds and scrip, it is said, all "worked" its way back to the bank, and heavy as the robbery appears, the loss in the end was but a trifle. How it "worked" its way back without an arrest or conviction of the thief, is the question that arises in the reflective mind in spite of attempted repression. It would be impossible to suppose—nay, it would be ungenerous for a moment to presume—that the police would bargain with the thieves to let them go if they would work back the stolen property after a great deal of mystification had taken place, so that they might obtain the reward; and it is just as unreasonable to suppose that a man having the abilities of a great bank robber, if he committed a crime of a grave nature, would give up what he might have stolen to participate in the reward. The thing is utterly preposterous! The idea is as repugnant as is that of miscegenation. Besides, the police are now too well learned in their school of instruction by Inspector Leonard not to know that such action would be compounding a felony, one of the easiest rules of the department taught and learned. I know such things cannot be; but this I believe, that there is a modus operandi whereby no compounding of a felony occurs, and yet much of that which is stolen in Wall street or its vicinity, after a time like the Wandering Jew, wafts back to the place it left with the mysterious wave of a wizard's hand, Can the police detectives enlighten the public? Thefts and robberies will take place, and often to very large amounts; but at the same time the reasoning mind will expect to see arrests—nay, not only arrests, but also convictions, if only occasionally. Of these fifteen robberies alluded to, embracing a loss of one million and a quarter dollars, has there been one conviction? The public are told by the police that these robberies are all committed by a gang of thieves they call the "Boston crowd." They profess to know who commit these robberies, and in the next breath deny all knowledge of their names. That is astonishing, but more astonishing still that none of that Boston crowd have been convicted, even if they have no name. Why, Wilkie Collins or Mrs. Braddon ought to come to Wall street if they want the foundation of a solid sensation romance. No Name! The name is not necessary to make an arrest if the felon is known, is it? If a man refuses to give his name he can be tried under the name of Roe, Doe, or any thing else, can he not? Why, if they had said that they knew the men by name, but not by sight, then they could be forgiven for being chary in their arrests, and once in a while a conviction follow—although there is none. Had they made that honest acknowledgment, then they might have been excused from the well known caution with which they act in keeping within the strict letter of the law in all arrests that are made. I would ask, is it true that every principle "fence," or receiver of stolen goods in New York city knows that at a certain loan office he can get the highest price for his goods, and no questions asked? And is it true that the chief of the detective force has a knowledge of said office, and that through that office, property for which rewards are offered is speedily brought to light? Is it true that a certain gentleman lost a diamond breastpin during a grand parado on Broadway, worth $2,000, and that he was advised at the central office to offer a reward for the same, when the locale of the property was already known to the dectective? These questions are asked for information. Is it true that a certain judge in New York lost a watch, which was hunted up and returned to him within two days? And is it true that a high official had a friend who lost a watch, and had it returned in an equally short space of time? And is it just as true that a gentleman without any such influence lost a watch, and was told at the central office that its recovery was hopeless that the cases were probably melted up and the works scattered in all directions? Is it true that the detectives of the central office frequent a certain saloon in Houston street, not far from Crosby, and spend hours there, playing cards with thieves and counterfeiters, and this with the knowledge of the chief detective? And is it true that one of these detectives passes counterfeit money himself? Is it true that a quantity of bogus money amounting to about $4,000, was taken by the police at the Carson House, and that the men who made the money and all the material were left behind untouched and for a consideration? The fire grows hotter under the cauldron, and it is even destined to boil still more furiously. Again let the guilty ones stand from under. The time for brow-beating, cant and sophistry is past. The wail of a thousand victims comes up through the corridors and out of room B—that room of general jobs, where legal and illegal bleedings have written in lines of blood their awful chronicles upon the walls. And these find an echo in that double-doored vault in the chief's office, into which the better class of criminals are taken and "worked" to the same great end. How many men have sacrificed their manhood, and how many women have bargained away their virtue there, may never be known. When a coming man invents a process to make these terribly pregnant walls speak and disclose their fearful records, human ears will shrink and human souls recoil at the utterances. That man is coming. Stand from under. Now, this is not a very good detective police, at least. Some remarkable things have been said about the officers of the metropolitan police force; but in relation to those officers and commissioners, I have only to say that I think they are, as a body, fair, high-toned and honorable men; and as to the uniformed police, the patrolmen, I never saw men fight as they fought during those three days of riot and bloodshed in July, 1863, and I do not believe that the soldiers in any of the battles of the rebellion fought more bravely or suffered more, in proportion to their numbers, than the police did on that occasion. Still, sir, they were like chaff before the wind when they met the infuriate mob, and they would never have been able to check the mob had it not been for the armed military force which came from Fort Hamilton, under General Brown, and which finally succeeded in dispersing the rioters. Now, sir, I was sorry to hear this matter discussed in a partisan spirit; and if I have said any thing to-night that has a political aspect [laughter]. I have said it partially in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] last night. I was sorry to hear that gentleman speak of Governor Seymour as having aided the rebellion—that old, stale, stereotyped slander. Who saved the capital of this nation when General Lee invaded Pennsylvania in 1863? Was it not the militia of this State, sent on to the scene of action by Governor Seymour; and did not President Lincoln and Secretary Stanton both send to Governor Seymour letters thanking him for his energy and patriotism in thus standing by the nation in its darkest hours? And did not a republican Legislature, the next winter, unanimously pass a resolution in both houses lauding him for such conduct? And yet the gentleman insists on hurling this foul slander forth from this body—insisting, in the face of history, that Governor Seymour aided the rebellion and incited riots in the city of New York. Now, as to the truth of these charges, read these letters and telegrams from Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania; Secretary Stanton, Governor Seymour and others:

THE PENNSYLVANIA INVASION—OFFICIAL TELEGRAMS.

"BY TELEGRAPH FROM WASHINGTON, June 15, 1863.

"To His Excellency, Gov. Seymour:

"The movements of the rebel forces in Virginia are now sufficiently developed, to show that General Lee, with his whole army, is moving forward to invade the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and other States.

"The President, to repel this invasion promptly, has called upon Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Western Virginia, for one hundred thousand (100,000) militia, for six (6) months, unless sooner discharged. It is important to have the largest possible force in the least time, and if other States would furnish militia for a short term, to be ordered on the draft, it would greatly advance the object. Will you please inform me, immediately, if, in answer to a special call of the President, you can raise and forward say twenty thousand (20,000) militia, as volunteers without bounty, to be credited on the draft of your State, or what number you can probably raise?

The call had to be for six months, unless sooner discharged, in order to comply with the law. It is not likely that more than thirty days' service—perhaps not so long—would be required. Can you forward your city regiments speedily? Please reply early.

The gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] knows that Governor Seymour said nothing on the occasion to which he refers which a fair, impartial man could take the least exception to. What did the Governor say? What were the treasonable words used in his Fourth of July oration in New York? Why, he made a remark during a long speech on the 4th of July, 1863, "that public opinion sometimes was indicated by a mob." Is this a new idea to the gentleman? It is a truism that has been asserted in every language and in every clime. Since the dark ages, every change of government has been indicated by mobs. The American revolution was inaugurated by the tea riot in Boston—a mob. Like many citizens of this nation, Governor Seymour had witnessed blundering, miserable management at Washington for two or three years. He saw that the Chief Executive of the nation imagined that he was a cut-out general from the start, and that he had been born and reared expressly for the purpose of freeing the slave and conquering the South. That Chief Executive had plans of battle for General McClellan, and plans of battle for General Grant, and for all his generals. He wanted General McClellan to go near enough to Richmond to just throw shells into it. (See President Lincoln's letter to General McClellan in published report.) He had plans of battle for General Grant at Vicksburg, and in a letter which he wrote a few days after that victory, he apologized to General Grant, saying that he had had a plan and the general had had a plan, and that he was very glad to see that the general's plan was the best. Governor Seymour, I say, like every other citizen, saw this blundering and mismanagement, and his speech at the Academy of Music in the city of New York, July 4, 1863, was made with reference to such mismanagement at Washington. Why, sir, I have the authority of Mr. Greeley for saying that the blundering generalship that we had in the early part of the war caused this country 250,000 lives. There was general dissatisfaction throughout the country. Thousands of millions of money had been spent; families had lost their fathers and brothers and sons, and the sacrifices had been made with no good result for the nation; and, to cap the climax, just about that time, the authorities at Washington endeavored to fix upon us an onerous and unjust draft. And Governor Seymour was simply warning the authorities at Washington to beware or such conduct would bring evil consequences upon our unhappy country. No gentleman here can say that that draft was not onerous and unjust, because the republican Legislature of this State, of 1864, when Governor Seymour had succeeded in getting our quota reduced six or eight thousand, passed a unanimous vote of thanks to Governor Seymour for so reducing it and stopping the nefarious draft. The Legislature, April 16, 1864, passed unanimously the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the thanks of this House be, and are hereby, tendered to His Excellency Governor Seymour for calling the attention of the general government at Washington to the errors in the apportionment of the quota of this State, under the enrollment act of March 3, 1863, and for his prompt and efficient efforts in procuring a correction of the same.

"Resolved, That the Clerk of this House transmit to the Governor a copy of this report and resolutions.

On the occasion of the riots referred to in this debate, Governor Seymour was called to the city of New York to quell them, and he did so. All must remember his two patriotic proclamations on that occasion. I will read them:

FIRST PROCLAMATION OF GOVERNOR SEYMOUR.

"To the People of the City of New York:

"A riotous demonstration in your city, originating in opposition to the conscription of soldiers for the military service of the United States, has swelled into vast proportions, directing its fury against the property and lives of peaceful citizens. I know that many of those who have participated in these proceedings would not have allowed themselves to be carried to such extremes of violence and of wrong, except under an apprehension of injustice; but such persons are reminded that the only opposition to the conscription which can be allowed is an appeal to the courts.

"The right of every citizen to make such an appeal will be maintained, and the decision of the courts must be respected and obeyed by rulers and people alike. No other course is consistent with the maintenance of the laws, the peace and order of the city, and the safety of its inhabitants.

"Riotous proceedings must and shall be put down. The laws of the State of New York must be enforced, its peace and order maintained, and the lives and property of all its citizens protected at any and every hazard. The rights of every citizen will be properly guarded and defended by the chief magistrate of the State.

"I do therefore call upon all persons engaged in these riotous proceedings to retire to their homes and employments, declaring to them that unless they do so at once I shall use all the power necessary to restore the peace and order of the city. I also call upon all well disposed persons, not enrolled for the preservation of order, to pursue their ordinary avocations.

"Let all citizens stand firmly by the constitutional authorities, sustaining law and order in the city, and ready to answer any such demand as circumstances may render necessary for me to make upon their services; and they may rely upon a rigid enforcement of the laws of this State against all who violate them.

"HORATIO SEYMOUR,
"Governor."

SECOND PROCLAMATION OF GOVERNOR SEYMOUR.

"WHEREAS, It is manifest that combinations for forcible resistance to the laws of the State of New York, and the execution of civil and criminal process, exist in the city and county of New York, whereby the peace and safety of the city and the lives and property of its inhabitants are endangered; and

"WHEREAS, The power of the said city and county has been exerted, and is not sufficient to enable the officers of the said city and county to maintain the laws of the State and execute the legal process of its officers; and

"WHEREAS, Application has been made to me by the sheriff of the city and county of New York to declare the said city and county to be in a state of insurrection; now, therefore,

"I, Horatio Seymour, Governor of the State of New York, and commander-in-chief of the forces of the same, do, in its name and by its authority, issue this proclamation in accordance with the statute in such cases made and provided, and do hereby declare the city and county of New York to be in a state of insurrection, and give notice to all persons that the means provided by the laws of this State for the maintenance of law and order will be employed to whatever degree may be necessary, and that all persons who shall, after the publication of this proclamation, resist, or aid or assist in resisting, any force ordered out by the Governor to quell or suppress such insurrection, will render themselves liable to the penalties prescribed by law.

"HORATIO SEYMOUR."

This is the only occasion that ever a Governor has declared New York city in a state of insurrection. How different with the rural districts? Almost every Governor, from Governor Seward to Governor Fenton, has annually declared some one or more counties in this State in insurrection against its laws. I refer to the many anti-rent troubles. A worthy gentleman who now occupies a position on this floor, and who was at that time mayor of the city, asked the Governor's aid in this matter. The riot had already raged for two or three days. There was a great concourse of people in the City Hall park, and I believe that it was at the instigation of the honorable gentleman to whom I have referred [Mr. Opdyke] that Governor Seymour addressed the crowd in front of the City Hall—was it not, sir?

[Mr. Opdyke shook his head.]

Mr. SCHUMAKER—I thought it was, sir. I was so informed. I will give the gentleman my authority. Senators Tweed and Cornell and others told me that they were present when the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] requested Governor Seymour to go out and address those gentlemen—I call them gentlemen, the Governor called them "friends." [Laughter.] I was there in Broadway at the time, not connected with the metropolitan police, but passing up and down to see to what extent the riot had gone, and I saw the crowd in the park and went over there and saw Governor Seymour addressing them, and I tell gentlemen that a more orderly gathering of people I never saw in the city of New York in my life at any political meeting. I could see no rioters there. They were evidently terror-stricken men—men who had wandered down from different parts of the city to the neighborhood of the City Hall for the purpose of seeing when this bloodshed and riot was to be stopped. I know something of men's faces, and to me the faces of those men had that appearance. They did not look, as the gentleman here to-day said they did, like returned soldiers and vagabonds; they looked like men who had the anxiety of fathers and brothers, like frightened citizens who had gone to the City Hall as the most natural place to find protection. They heard Governor Seymour. He addressed them as "friends." That, it appears, was a great offense. It would seem from what has been said here as if the Governor should have said, "You cursed scoundrels, what are you doing here?" Because there had been a riot in New York the Governor was to take it for granted that the quiet men before him were rioters, on the principle of the Irishman at Donnybrook fair, "wherever you see a head hit it." But Governor Seymour took another course. He quietly addressed those citizens, and they quietly went away, and I defy any gentleman to point out a single man of that crowd who committed any violence either before that time, at that time, or after that time.

Mr. SEAVER—Will the gentleman from Kings allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Yes, sir.

Mr. SEAVER—I merely wish to ask the gentleman if he believes there was a riot in New York at all in 1863? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Yes; I know there was; I saw it. Now will the gentleman from Franklin [Mr. Seaver] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SEAVER—Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Why do you ask me such a very foolish question? [Laughter.] If the gentleman is deaf I excuse him [laughter], for I just said that I saw the riot and that the metropolitan police fought those rioters as courageously as ever did volunteers of our army fight the enemy. I say so again, sir. They astonished me. They went forward with reckless bravery, and seemed to be "chawed up," as it were, by the masses of rioters, who fell upon them with shovels and tongs and spikes and pistols. I saw that riot, sir; I saw nearly every thing connected with it, but the "white horse," [laughter] which was mentioned in that description which was read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] yesterday. The Virginian who was mounted on that "white horse" was a miserable drunken shuyster from about the Tombs. That is the reason I asked the gentleman yesterday what he was reading from. He told us that the rioters were the vanguard of Lee's army; that the men and women who were afraid their fathers and husbands would be drafted, and drafted unfairly, were the vanguard of Lee's army, led on by a "Virginian Andrews" on a white horse. [Laughter.] So far as I recollect, nothing was ever done with Andrews afterward. By universal consent, he was accounted a poor miserable fellow, not worth minding. He was afterward pulled out from under a bed in a state of beastly intoxication, and I do not think that he was even sent to State prison, but only to Blackwell's Island. I doubt if even that was done. I do not pretend to remember that fact exactly, but I thought he was considered of no account at all, and the first time that I have seen him loom up in these large proportions is in this picture drawn by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] in which he appears mounted upon a big "white horse." I have made these remarks about that crowd in justice to Governor Seymour; and I will add that I was informed by Governor Seymour about that time, that he had been asked by Mr. Opdyke to go out and address those men; and Mr. Tweed has told me that he was present when Mr. Opdyke asked Governor Seymour to go out and address the crowd. I say this because I am fair enough to say what I mean, and to give my authority when they make no objection. Now, we want this Constitution put in such shape as that there can be no misunderstanding it; so that no "metropolitan district" can be formed hereafter by the Legislature, and the authority of our local officers nullified and destroyed. We want the Constitution made plain on that point. We want the Constitution fixed so that when we have aldermen and mayors they will be such in reality, otherwise we do not want them at all. What is the use of supervisors or other county or town officers if the Legislature can put three or four counties together and appoint a commission to take the place of those officers. There is no reason for that. It is not necessary. I say to my venerable friend from Troy [Mr. M. I. Townsend] that it is not necessary to have that state of things to have good order in the city of Troy. Let the charter of Troy be amended so as to secure a non-partisan police. Let there be a police force with just as many republicans as democrats, and be sure to stick in an American here and there.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—They were all "stuck in" with the democracy.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Ah! indeed; it was different down our way. I know that when this metropolitan police was organized, it was under the control of the men of the torch and the dark lantern, and most of the old know nothings were put into it—put in by hundreds—all gobbled up by the republicans They made very good policemen, some of them. The only difficulty was that when they met an Irishman they wanted to club him. [Laughter.] The metropolitan police of 1857 was a perfect hotbed of know nothingism, of all descriptions and kinds, and most of the sergeants, captains and other officers belonged to that old worn-out party, which expired about the days of Fremont and Jessie. [Laughter.] But I say to the gentleman from Rensselaer again, you can have a non-partisan police in Troy without this district arrangement, and you can have good order there. The Constitution gives the sheriff authority to call upon all the people in case of necessity, even so far down as Stephentown [laughter], and even to call out the military force if necessary. Why, is not that enough? It has been enough for us in Brooklyn. The police have never quelled a riot there. We have had a good many riots in Brooklyn. We had the angel Gabriel riots in 1854. [Laughter.] We had the know nothing riots, where they attempted to burn two or three Catholic churches. We had the Atlantic dock riots. In those cases the sheriff called out a regiment or two, and that was the end of it. And that is the right way to put down a riot. It is wrong to put policemen where they were put in the city of New York. It is wrong to put policemen with only clubs in their hands against rioters with shovels and muskets. It is the military that should be put to face and disperse rioters. My friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] said in relation to our Legislature that it should not be compared to the government of the irresponsible Emperor of the French, because there were in it "honest and conscientious" men from all parts of the State. Now, I do not wish to make the assertion myself, but in relation to the Legislature which passed the metropolitan police bill, I have an authority which ought to be acceptable to gentlemen upon the other side of this question. Hon. A. M. Clapp, the editor of the Buffalo Express, a republican paper (who was the republican candidate for Secretary of State in 1857, and who was defeated by my friend Mr. Tucker, whom I see before me), said:

"It will be known throughout all time as the infamous Legislature of 1857; that the odor which came from that Legislature while it was in session and afterward was more pestilential and deadly than the miasma which arose from the poisoned valley, and the question was not, 'Is your bill just or equitable?' but 'What will you give? What is the highest price?'"

And he ends his article by saying that that Legislature was "a nest of thieves and plunderers." I think that is about as bad language as that which has been used here by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins], and the gentleman from Troy [Mr. M. I. Townsend], in relation to my constituents. [Laughter.] Indeed, there could hardly be any thing worse said about any body than what was said by Hon. Almon M. Clapp, of the Legislature of 1857. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins], in his very elaborate arguments, said that the street commissioner's office and the departments in the city of New York were corrupt, and it was exceedingly funny when he announced with virtuous indignation that the officers and employees of those departments had at least two months of their salary taken from them annually for political purposes. Was that news to him? Was it news to any one who knew any thing about politics in the city of New York? Why, it is part of the discipline of both parties that political officers should help pay the necessary expenses of a political campaign. It always has been so and always should be so. Why, this great police organization, which the gentleman eulogizes, bought a house and lot for its president, General James W. Nye, by assessing its members. Every one must remember this; it is part of the history of our police, and every newspaper in our vicinity poured out "vials of wrath" on the swindle, but General Nye was too much of a gentleman to be affected by any thing that the newspapers said, and permitted the assessment to go on, and a deed was made out to Mrs. General Nye for a house and lot; and they now always nip a little off the salaries for two or three months for political purposes. Indeed, the State republican central committee, of which the gentleman has always been a member, and has often been chairman, keeps that system going all the time. And here again, I do not make this statement simply upon my own authority. I have the authority of a republican very high in this State, and one whose word, I think, will scarcely be doubted in the city of Albany. I will read what he says in relation to the State central committee:

Mr. AXTELL—Who wrote that?

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Thurlow Weed. [Laughter.] He says:

"During the last few years the republican State committees have been permanent institutions. They consist of a battalion of enterprising gentlemen from various parts of the State, who live at first-rate hotels during the canvass, and repair to Albany, taking apartments at the Delavan House, for a winter campaign.

"In addition to fabulous sums of money raised and squandered by these 'State committees' during a canvass, they continue their exactions and expenditures during the year. There is no interval or let up to the demands of these political horse leeches. Before and after an election and all through the year, their cry is 'give,' 'give.'

"But the worst remains to be told. While thus plundering, they are ruining the republican party. Under their management, since 1864, a stable majority of sixty thousand has not only been sponged out, but we are left, by the canvass of 1867, in a minority of fifty thousand.

"We submit, therefore, whether 'republican State committees,' as now constituted, are not quite too expensive; whether we are not paying 'too dear' for such 'whistles,' and whether some gentlemen, who keep going 'round with the hat,' should not be informed that their little game is 'played out.'"

Mr. HAND—Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Yes, sir.

Mr. HAND—Does the gentleman really believe that the gentleman whose language he is quoting [Thurlow Weed] understands that subject? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Well, I don't know. You have trained with him longer than I have—what have you to say about that? [Laughter.] I never was a high private in republican ranks. I never belonged to that party, and I think it is extremely modest for a man who has grown old as a soldier in the same party with him to ask such a question of me. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAND—When he [Mr. Weed] became so bad as to be intolerable he went over to you,

Mr. SCHUMAKER—He never came over to us. He was the founder of your party, and is now one of its leaders, and edits the only journal that openly advocates your favorite, Gen. Grant, for the presidency. I don't know whether that statement of Mr. Weed's is true or not, but I believe it is, for I know the republican central committee assessed every notary public in the State and every postmaster, and one poor postmaster in Erie county sold his only cow to pay the assessment of fifty dollars last fall. I merely cite it as republican evidence of the doings of the State central committee.

Mr. AXTELL—Not at all.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Is he not a republican? You cannot place him anywhere else. You cannot read him out of the party. That must be done by some higher official than my friend from Clinton. He has always pretended to be a republican, and I never heard it questioned before. The celebrated correspondence of "T. W." and "H. G." ought to settle that fact. "T. W." heads one wing of the party for General Grant, and "H. G." heads the other wing for Judge Chase. I believe it was once rumored about that Raymond, Weed & Co., were going to support a man called Japanese Pruyn who was once very foolishly put on the democratic ticket for Lieutenant-Governor, but neither of them ever did so. If any such arrangement was ever made, which I very much doubt, it was never carried out, for the only vote that candidate ever got from any other party than the democratic was his own [laughter], and after the election he went back to the republican camp [laughter], where he was received with open arms by its leaders, Weed & Co. The republicans are welcome to him—he was a dead weight upon us—and the Lord deliver us from such converts. We never want to see the light of his countenance in our camp again. He was rank poison to us. [Laughter.] In concluding my remarks, I would say, Mr. Chairman, that this police commission—to return to that branch of the subject—has been a pretty expensive affair for the city of churches. We do not require much of a police there. But the Legislature paid no attention to the remonstrances of the people of Brooklyn in relation to being annexed to the city of New York. They did not listen to our cry. They made us pay $300 more per head for our policemen, although the policemen we previously had, who received a salary of $500, were satisfied with the payment they got, but they increased our expenses from $137,000 in 1857 to nearly half a million in 1867. Now, that I say, as a citizen of Brooklyn, was entirely unnecessary, I say that we never asked for it; and, although they appointed us a police commissioner from Brooklyn (an unexceptionable gentleman, Mr. Stranahan), I say that the expense was unnecessary and uncalled for in every particular. Previous to that law, men were running from every direction for appointments on the old police, although the pay was only $500 a year. But the Albany Legislature of 1857, which Mr. Clapp calls such horrible names, said, inasmuch as you, in your liberality, give large democratic majorities, we will raise your expenses, and they did raise them in the matter of the police over $200,000 the first year, and we have to stand it. The highest court decided against us in testing the constitutionality of the law, and we have submitted quietly to it ever since. We submitted to the laws, but still hoped that the "sober second thought" would some day come, when the people of this State would see the folly and unfairness of treating us, their neighbors and brothers, as conquered provinces. Last summer it did seem almost certain that this body would be firm and decided, and put its seal of condemnation upon all such laws. But the occurrences of the last few days have driven all hopes out of my mind as to such a change of affairs. A powerful lobby has been in attendance here from all parts of the State, particularly from New York, consisting of delegations of the Union League and the so-called citizens' committee, all clamoring for the continuation of these commissions. The party whip has been cracked about the heads of the leaders of the party in the majority in this body, and they must obey their masters' bidding. The friends of free government have nothing to expect from here. It was not my intention to have taken up so much of the time of the committee upon rising, and I apologize for so long trespassing upon you my unstudied and impaired views.

Mr. OPDYKE—Mr. Chairman, Governor Seymour having been referred to in connection with acts of mine, I ask to be permitted to make a few remarks in explanation of my own conduct in connection with his during the riots. Since we have had so much in reference to the riots of July, 1863, I think we had bettor have the whole of it, that we may understand the matter fully. I have already endeavored to do ample justice to the head, and to the rank and file of the metropolitan police force; but, sir, as the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Schumaker] has well said, faithful as they were, and earnestly as they labored, their labors would have been unavailing but for the aid of the slender military force that we were fortunately through great effort enabled to unite with them. When the riots broke out on Monday morning, the news came to my office about a quarter before ten o'clock. I immediately sent a message to the police commissioners, and to General Sandford and General Wool, asking a conference. I found myself utterly without power; the law creating the police department had not only excluded from that board the mayor of that city, but it had also taken from him and transferred to the police commissioners, as the framers of that law supposed, the exclusive power to call out the military force for the suppression of riots. My legal friends, however found in searching the statutes of the State, an old law in relation to the militia of the State, which conferred upon the mayor of cities, and sheriffs of counties, authority to call out the militia to aid in suppressing riots. The head of the police commissioners came to my office. I asked him to join me in a requisition on General Sandford to call out the State militia. He declined. I then made the requisition myself in virtue of that old law, although I had serious doubts whether it had not been superseded by the act creating the metropolitan police; but in view of the urgent necessity of the case I did not hesitate a moment to assume the responsibility. Gen. Wool, with great alacrity, sent to all the fortifications in the harbor, and mustered all the forces he could. He brought them to the city, and was about to put them under the command of an official of the United States government, who, in my judgment, did not possess the requisite military skill, courage and public confidence to perform the duty satisfactorilly. I therefore urged him to substitute General Brown, which he did. I immediately telegraphed to Governor Seymour, who was then sojourning in New Jersey, and asked him to authorize us, in the absence of nearly all our organized military forces, to call the State national guard from adjoining counties. I think I telegraphed him twice, but got no response. And, in conjunction with General Wool, we sent telegrams to every quarter where we deemed it possible that military aid could be secured; but all our efforts were of little avail. Up to 12 o'clock on the night of the first day of the riot we had succeeded in collecting little more than eight hundred men of all arms: I then telegraphed to Governor Seymour, advising him to come to the city, in the hope that through his authority we should be able to get more military force. I telegraphed, also, to the Secretary of War, informing him of the condition of things, and suggested that some of our regiments be returned, if possible, from the seat of war. Governor Seymour arrived on Tuesday morning, and came to my rooms at the St. Nicholas Hotel, where he remained with me during the entire riots, except that soon after his arrival he accompanied me to the City Hall, where it was not possible for us to accomplish any good, as the riots were going on in the upper part of the city, and most all of the murders and devastations of property were in that part of the city. But many evil disposed persons had gathered about the City Hall, and the newspaper offices were threatened. My friend from Kings [Mr. Schumaker] could not have extended his view very far from the steps of the City Hall or he would not have stated that the mob were so peaceably disposed. He might have seen, by extending his vision, many scenes like this: peaceable colored men crossing the Park or walking along the streets attacked by crowds of assailants and fleeing for their lives.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—I only spoke of the time when Governor Seymour was there.

Mr. OPDYKE—Perhaps at that very moment there might not have been any thing of that kind. But immediately after he was there, those scenes did transpire, and on the same day a newspaper office, fronting the City Hall, was attacked. I now come to the point of my advising the Governor to address the crowd. I shook my head when my friend from Kings [Mr. Schumaker] made the remark. And, on reflection, while I have not the slightest doubt that I concurred in recommending it, I am quite sure that others suggested that he should address the crowd. My colleague, Mr. Hutchins, who was present, now informs me that my recollection is correct. But the terms in which he should address them, or what words of endearment he should use [laughter] I certainly had nothing to do in suggesting; nor had I any share in framing the speech he made to them. He left very soon after, in a carriage with some friends, to go where the riots were taking place, and then returned to the St. Nicholas Hotel, where he remained during the riots. It was not until the military under General Brown, who was second in command to General Wool, was united to the police force, that they succeeded in withstanding and repelling the rioters, who outnumbered ten to one the organized force against them. I also urged the police commissioners to arm their force. They said they would not do so without the sanction of the Governor. I offered to take the responsibility of making the requisition for the arms, and furnishing them. But they declined it. When Governor Seymour arrived, he very cheerfully and promptly acquiesced in the suggestion, and gave requisitions for arms, which were taken to the police head-quarters; but as the military strength was increasing, it turned out there was no occasion for the police to use them, though they could have been used very effectively at an earlier stage of the riot. I mean to be entirely just to Governor Seymour in regard to his conduct during the continuance of the riots, though he has not been just to me. Prior to the riot he made a serious misrepresentation of my official conduct in a message to the Legislature, of which I asked a public retraction. He very frankly and promptly gave a verbal retraction, with a promise of giving one for publication. After patiently waiting week after week, and month after month, during which time that promise was more than once renewed, but never performed, I abandoned the effort. It has never been performed. But I have this to say of Governor Seymour: he was surrounded during the riot by many bad advisers —scores of them—on some occasions I think there were one hundred in my room — most of them urging him to exert his influence to withdraw the military resistance to the rioters, and to endeavor to quiet them by moral suasion. In opposition to them, nearly every city official, all of whom except myself were democrats, earnestly counseled otherwise, and indignantly condemned the advice that he was receiving from his more numerous friends. And while I thought, sometimes, he was vacillating, and disposed to interfere in a manner which, in my judgment, would be disastrous to the best interests of the city, it turned out that my apprehensions were ungrounded. He never yielded to these bad counsels, but, to the end, stood firm. Every thing that it was possible for him to do was done, to aid in the suppression of the riots. At my instance he gave requisitions for arms to scores, and even hundreds of private citizens, whose warehouses or dwellings were threatened. He did not hesitate in a single instance, whenever I vouched for the respectability of the applicants for arms. On one occasion, I think it was Wednesday afternoon, a conference was to be held among the officials at the police head-quarters to determine on the line of action and defense during the afternoon and evening. My friend, Mr. Hutchins, was there at the time, and will confirm the truth of what I say. Governor Seymour came in with at least twenty of his political and personal friends, and among them were several gentlemen who were very much excited, because, as they declared, the troops under the command of General Brown, in the Twentieth ward, were shooting down innocent and peaceable citizens, who had congregated from mere curiosity, under the excitement that was existing, and that they were not rioters at all. General Brown asked if they had not been firing buildings and barricading the streets. They answered in the affirmative, but said it was in self-defense. The General replied if this was not rioting he did not know what was. These gentlemen urged that Governor Seymour should recall the troops, and they pledged themselves that they would disperse the crowd by peaceable means and moral suasion. The friends of Governor Seymour were urgent that he should exercise his military authority as Governor of this State and commander-in-chief, to make General Brown withdraw his troops. The Governor very properly felt, I have no doubt, that he had no authority to interfere, at all events he did not interfere. The police commissioners also joined in urging General Brown to withdraw his troops. I was the only one to counsel General Brown to turn a deaf ear to any such advice, because all history proves that the only way to put down a riot as formidable in its proportions as this, was to shoot it down. He replied, with several expletives which I will not repeat, that I need not give myself any uneasiness, that whatever the Governor, or any friend of his, or any one else might say, no troops under his command should ever retire before a mob unless driven back. That spirit and determination of General Brown had much to do in inspiriting all in authority to aid in resisting the force of the rioters and in putting them down. Though, on many occasions, Governor Seymour was advised to interfere, he never did interfere, and his conduct during those riots met my entire approval. I have stated these things to show that while the police force did all that it was possible to do, that unaided, they would have been utterly unable to suppress the riot without the hearty co-operation of the military force. That force was mainly under the control of General Wool. He had brought it to the relief of the city at my request; he considered himself under my immediate direction and desired my presence and advice throughout the riots.

Mr. BAKER—I desire to explain to the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Schumaker] who probably did not hear what I said last evening in reference to the speech of Governor Seymour, that I referred to the speech he made on the fourth of July, in the Academy of Music, in the city of New York, and not the speech he is said to have made to the rioters.

Mr. AXTELL—I move that the committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. RUMSEY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had under consideration the report of the Committee on Cities, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had instructed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on granting leave, and it was declared carried.

Mr. SILVESTER—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Silvester, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 30, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment at ten o'clock A. M.

Prayer was offered by Rev. EDWARD SELKIRK.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. GRAVES—I desire to give notice that I shall, at the proper time, move to reconsider the vote by which the eleventh section of the article reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, as amended and reported from the Committee of the Whole was adopted; also to reconsider the vote by which the seventeenth section of the same report was adopted; also to reconsider so much of the eighteenth section of the same report as denies to the board of supervisors the power to fix the salary of the county judge; also to reconsider the sixteenth section of the same report in relation to fixing the tenure of office of the supreme court judge at fourteen years; also the second section of the report of the Committee on the Organization of the Legislature which fixes the official term of Senators at four years; also section 5 of the same report which fixes the salary of the members of the Legislature at one thousand dollars; also section 8 in the report of the Committee on Canals as amended in Committee of the Whole; also section seven in the report on the Governor, etc., or so much of it as forbids the increasing or diminishing of his compensation during his term of office; also section 13 of the report of the Committee on the Power and Duties of the Legislature, which denies the right of trial by jury, under said section, to claimants against the State.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] that the notices which he gives are not in order until the vote by which the entire article was adopted shall be reconsidered.

Mr. GRAVES—I so understood it, and I gave the notices with that view.

The PRESIDENT—The notice which the gentleman has given is for a motion to reconsider the separate sections. The notice, to be in order, must be for an amendment to reconsider the articles which have been adopted.

Mr. ALVORD—In order to obviate any difficulty in this regard, I gave notice yesterday morning of a motion to reconsider every article which we have adopted.

Mr. HATCH—We do not thank the gentleman, and I do not propose to be "flopped" by it either. I give the following notice:

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the notice as follows:

Mr. Hatch gives notice that he will at some future day move to reconsider the vote by which the article on finance was adopted, in order that it may be amended by the addition of the following:

SEC. 6. The Legislature shall not lease or otherwise dispose of any of the canals of the State, but they shall remain the property of the State and under its management forever. After the payment of all the debts for which the canal revenues are now pledged, and after all advances with interest thereon, heretofore or hereafter made for canal purposes, shall be repaid, no more or greater tolls shall ever thereafter be imposed, charged or levied upon property transported on the canals than shall be sufficient for ordinary repairs and further necessary improvements.

Mr. M. H. LAWRENCE—I wish to call up a resolution offered by Mr. Prosser, to reconsider the vote by which the section of the financial article postponing the building of the Capitol for ten years was stricken out.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Yates [Mr. M. H. Lawrence] that the vote by which that article was adopted must first be reconsidered before his motion can be entertained.

Mr. M. H. LAWRENCE—As I understand the resolution, it was to reconsider that vote.

The PRESIDENT—The resolution will be read.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read as follows:

"Mr. Prosser moved to reconsider the vote on the motion of Mr. Harris to strike out section 14 of the report of the Committee on the Finances of the State, as reported by the Committee of the Whole, in words the following:"

Digitized by Google

The PRESIDENT—Under the ruling of the Chair, the resolution is not now in order.

Mr. FOLGER—I give the following notice.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the notice as follows:

Mr. Folger gives notice that he will at some early day move to reconsider the vote by which the proposition was defeated to continue in office the present judges of the court of appeals.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair holds that that article on the judiciary has not been adopted. It was simply referred to the Judiciary Committee, with power to report complete.

Mr. MURPHY—I would like to inquire of the Chair whether the notice to reconsider an article is also needed to reconsider all parts of the article.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair holds that if the Convention shall reconsider the article, the Convention will be under the order of amendments generally, and that if an amendment shall be offered which has been offered heretofore, and been rejected, or the same in substance, then the vote by which that section was adopted or rejected must be reconsidered.

Mr. MURPHY—I would inquire if, in such a case, three days' previous notice is necessary?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair holds that three days' notice is necessary.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—I desire to give notice that, at some future time, I shall move to reconsider the vote by which the article on education was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—The notice will be received and entered by the Secretary.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I offer the following resolution, relating to the order of business.

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the debate in Convention upon the article relating to cities be limited to speeches of ten minutes, and that no delegate be permitted to speak longer than that time upon any one question, and that the final vote upon the article be taken to-morrow at twelve o'clock, unless sooner disposed of.

Mr. PROSSER—Have we passed notices? I have not heard the Chair announce resolutions.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair thinks we have passed notices, but the Convention will recur to that order of business if it was not so understood.

Mr. PROSSER—I desire to give notice that I shall, at some early day, move to reconsider sections 2, 3 and 4, of the report of the Committee on the Finances of the State, and if necessary, for that object, I shall move to reconsider the whole article.

The PRESIDENT—The notice is received.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I do not exactly understand the ruling of the Chair; I desire to reconsider the vote by which the eighth section of the judiciary article was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—That article not having been adopted, no vote having been taken upon that question, the gentleman may give notice of a motion to reconsider the section to which he refers.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Then I give that notice.

The PRESIDENT—The notice is received and will be entered.

The PRESIDENT announced the question on the adoption of the resolution offered by Mr. E. Brooks, in reference to debate on the article on cities.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I move to amend the resolution by fixing the hour of taking the vote at seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. OPDYKE—I hope that neither the original motion nor the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro] will be adopted. I, for one, feel that we have not continued this debate far enough to enable us to determine what it will be best for this Convention to do, in regard to the government of cities, even with the additional time that is proposed between now and to-morrow at twelve o'clock. The subject is confessedly one of the most difficult and most important that has come before this Convention. We have yet had before us but one section of one report. There are two important minority reports that have not been considered at all, in reference to one of which I shall ask the serious consideration of the Convention. I feel that we had better proceed with this debate in Convention until we can see our way clearly to a conclusion that it would be safe for us to arrive at. We are told upon one side that, unless we adopt the majority report, our Constitution will be defeated. I think there are many gentlemen who feel that if we adopt the report of the majority it will and ought to defeat the Constitution we frame. I think we had better take no action to shorten this debate until we can see our way to some conclusion that will be likely to prove satisfactory to this Convention.

Mr. KINNEY—I do not know that I understand the effect of this motion. It strikes me that it provides for a vote being taken upon the article at the time specified. Does it not so read?

Mr. E. BROOKS—Yes, sir; at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT—It provides that the final vote on the article be taken at twelve o'clock.

Mr. KINNEY—It appears to me that it does not give us any opportunity for amendment if we have got to adopt the article at that particular time.

Mr. MURPHY—I am opposed to this motion. I do not think it is just on the part of the mover [Mr. E. Brooks] after having given his views, as he has, at length, to shut off gentlemen who are prepared to speak on this matter before the Convention. There is at least one gentleman whom I wish to hear, and who will occupy much more time than ten minutes—the time specified in the resolution. I wish to have all the light I can get upon this question before I vote, and for one I am opposed to both the resolution and amendment.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I did not suppose that this resolution would prevent a full and fair discussion. Nor do I understand that it concludes any gentleman from occupying even an hour and a half this morning, if he desires to speak at so great a length. We shall have this evening and to-morrow until twelve o'clock to discuss the article and adopt whatever amendment shall be proposed. One word in regard to the order of business of this Convention. I feel that we have been here quite too long for the public interest, to speak frankly, and quite too long, with proper regard to our individual interest; and I believe the time has come when it is necessary to put some limitation upon the business of the Convention, and if possible to fix a day within some fifteen days hence, when we may finally adjourn. From the motions made yesterday and to-day for reconsideration, it is plainly the purpose of a large number of the delegates here to reconsider the work which has been done since we assembled in June last. No article has been named here upon which a motion has not been made to reconsider. Hardly any section of any article which has been adopted by the Convention in the course of its deliberations, but upon which motions have not been made to reconsider in detail. I say, in the public interest, that I think we ought to name some day, some hour, when we will conclude our deliberations upon the pending subject which has been before this Convention for some eight or nine days, and also in regard to the final deliberations of the Convention.

Mr. CURTIS—It is very clear that, thus far in this debate, it has proceeded upon the general principle stated by the chairman of the committee [Mr. Harris] that the vote on the pending motion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] would be a decisive or test vote upon the article. As I understand the motion of my colleague from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], it is that the final question on the whole article be taken to-morrow at twelve o'clock, leaving from now until that hour the only time within which the article itself can be perfected. As the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] says, there are others who desire to state at length their views upon the question. Those gentlemen who have taken part in the debate having expressed their views at very great length—I among them—it is certainly, sir, nothing but an act of fairness upon the part of the Convention to show that courtesy to other members; and I hope, therefore, that the resolution of my colleague [Mr. E. Brooks] will not prevail.

Mr. HATCH—I desire to correct the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] in his statement that every amendment that has been proposed has been acted upon by the Convention. The sections that I proposed to be added to the finance article this morning have never been acted upon in Convention.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Chesebro to the resolution offered by Mr. E. Brooks to take a final vote on the article at seven o'clock this evening, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred and was put on the resolution offered by Mr. E. Brooks, and it was declared lost.

Mr. FOLGER—I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That all questions and motions to reconsider be taken without debate.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Of course every motion to reconsider will be voted down unless some gentleman explains why it is that he makes the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT—The resolution giving rise to debate, it will lay over under the rule.

Mr. MORRIS—I offer the following resolution, and ask that it lie on the table:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the President to audit the accounts of this Convention which may remain unsettled at its final adjournment, and that said committee be allowed, while actually employed on such duty, the same pay as provided for members of this Convention during its sessions.

The PRESIDENT—The resolution will lie on the table at the request of the mover.

Mr. SILVESTER—I desire to call up for consideration the motion made by me at the time when the report of the Committee on Currency and Banking was under consideration, to reconsider the vote by which that article was adopted, with a view to have stricken out of that article a clause which prohibits the consolidation of railroad corporations where the aggregate amount of capital of the corporations proposed to be consolidated is over twenty millions of dollars.

The PRESIDENT—Does the question refer to the vote on the adopted section?

Mr. SILVESTER—On the adopted section.

The PRESIDENT—Then the motion of the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Silvester] is not in order.

Mr. SILVESTER—I made the motion on the morning as soon as the article was adopted. The Chair then informed me that it was not necessary to make that motion, Judge Robertson having made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of Judge Parker was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—If any notice was given of a motion to reconsider the section at the time it will be reconsidered. At what time was the motion given?

Mr. SILVESTER—Some time in August—it was the thirty-first of August.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the notice of Mr. Silvester, as follows:

"Mr. Silvester moved to reconsider the vote on the adoption of the first section of the article reported by the joint committee on currency, banking and insurance, and on corporations other than municipal, banking and insurance."

The PRESIDENT—The resolution is not in order under the ruling of the Chair, if the gentleman has nothing later than that.

Mr. SILVESTER—Then I wish to give notice that at some future day I shall move to reconsider the vote by which the article on currency, banking, insurance and corporations other than municipal, was adopted; also, at some future day to reconsider the vote by which section first of the article on currency, banking and insurance and corporations other than municipal, was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—The notice is received.

Mr. SILVESTER—And the section to which it refers.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I desire to call up a motion to reconsider the vote by which the article on the powers and duties of the Legislature was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—When did the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston] give notice?

Mr. LIVINGSTON — The gentleman from Franklin [Mr. Seaver] gave notice some time last week to reconsider.

The SECRETARY read the notice.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I simply desire to explain that a reconsideration of this article is necessary in order to reach the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment I proposed in relation to building street railroads in the cities was lost. For the benefit of the members of the Convention who were not present when the vote was taken on the amendment proposed, I will state to them its purport. The section in the article, as it was originally framed, provided that no street railroads should be built without the consent of the local authorities in the cities and incorporated villages, and also the consent of the property owners of one-half of the assessed value of the property along the line of the street where the railroad was to be built. It further provided that the franchise should be sold to the highest bidder. That last feature appeared to excite a great deal of opposition. After having been thoroughly discussed, the whole section was struck out on the motion of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale]. Understanding as I do that gentlemen who were in favor of striking out the article are not opposed to that portion of it which requires the consent of the authorities and the consent of a proper proportion of the property owners along the street where th proposed railroad is to be built, I offered an amendment embracing substantially these features; that is, that the Legislature, in its general law, should not authorize the construction of street railways in any city without the consent of the city authorities and the consent of the property owners, to the extent of one-third instead of one-half of the assessed value of the property along the line of the proposed road; or if that consent should not be obtained, then making it necessary to obtain the consent of the supreme court, on an application to be made under such rules and regulations as the Legislature should adopt. That motion, I believe, was voted down, but there were comparatively few members of the Convention in attendance at that time. I see now a good many gentlemen here who were not present on that occasion, and I hope that the resolution which I offer will be adopted.

Mr. McDONALD—In regard to this motion, it will be remembered by the Convention that the section as it was first put in the Constitution was put in when this body was comparatively full, and I think the ayes and noes were called upon the question. When it was stricken out the Convention was in such a condition that the ayes and noes were not called, and I suppose could not have been called. It seems to me, therefore, that for that reason this motion should be reconsidered. There is another matter which I wish to call up if this motion to reconsider prevails. That is in regard to the prohibition against towns and counties issuing bonds in aid of building railroads and other internal improvements. I had intended to call that up when the report of the Committee of the Whole on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature was under consideration in Convention, but the conclusion of that report came up on a day when I was not here. I understand that quite a number of the members of the Convention, and certainly I can speak for myself in that regard, have changed their views upon that subject. I voted at first to prohibit towns and counties from issuing bonds, but I am now in favor of allowing it under certain restrictions. I am informed that there are quite a number of members whose opinions have changed upon this subject, and I hope that both matters will be disposed of and to this end, that the motion to reconsider will prevail.

Mr. RUMSEY—I call for the reading of the seventeenth section reported by the Committee of the Whole, which was stricken out.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the section as follows:

SEC. 17. No street railroad shall hereafter be constructed or operated within any of the cities or incorporated villages of this State until the consent of the local authorities of such village or city shall be first obtained for that purpose, and also the consent of the owners of at least one-half in value of the property, as fixed by the assessment roll of the previous year, on that portion of each street through or over which the same shall be constructed, be previously had and obtained for that purpose; or in case the consent of such property owners be not obtained, then with the consent of the general term of the supreme court of the district in which such road shall be located to be first obtained; such consent to be obtained and authenticated in such manner as the Legislature shall by general law for that purpose provide. The franchise allowing such railroad to be operated, when the same shall be wholly or principally operated within the limits of any city or incorporated village, shall be sold at public auction to the bidder who will build and operate said road at the lowest fare, which fare shall never be increased, after three months' public notice, describing the route of such railroad, in the State paper, and in such newspapers in the city or village where said railroad shall be located as the Legislature shall direct.

Mr. RUMSEY—I simply desire to call the attention of the Convention to the condition in which we shall have left this matter, if we do not reconsider this article. We have adopted in this article a provision that the Legislature shall provide by a general law for the laying down of street railroads. There is neither in that section nor in any other section of the Constitution any prohibition upon any company that shall be organized under that general law from going into any street of the city of New York, or Buffalo, or Rochester, or Brooklyn, and laying down a railroad at their pleasure. This section was inserted for the express purpose of preventing that state of things. We in the country care but very little about it; we have no desire to have any restriction upon laying down rails in streets in the country, as they would never be laid down where they would be apt to bother us; but we all know from experience, that unless there is some restriction upon these companies to prevent them from laying down these rails in cities, there will be an incessant squabble in the city of New York in reference to this subject. If gentlemen there desire, or if gentlemen in Buffalo or in Rochester, desire that these cities shall be subject to these annoyances, I have no objection; but I desire that they should understand and know precisely the effect of leaving the Constitution with this section stricken out.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—May I ask the gentleman to read the section which was stricken out.

Mr. RUMSEY—It is in document 136.

SEC. 17. No street railroad shall hereafter be constructed or operated within any of the cities or incorporated villages of this State, until the consent of the local authorities of such village or city shall be first obtained for that purpose, and also the consent of the owners of at least one-half in value of the property, as fixed by the assessment roll of the previous year, on that portion of each street through or over which the same shall be constructed, be previously had and obtained for that purpose; or in case the consent of such property owners be not obtained, then with the consent of the general term of the supreme court of the district in which such road shall be located to be first obtained; such consent to be obtained and authenticated in such a manner as the Legislature shall by general law for that purpose provide.

The subsequent part of that section and which I have not read was stricken out—I do not now recollect precisely for what reason—but this is enough to show the object of the committee, that it was to require the consent of the local authorities and some other restrictions upon the power of these companies organized under the general law for laying down street railroads.

Mr. STRATTON—In regard to this section that is now sought to be restored, or in part to be restored to meet the contingency which seems to have arisen by striking out the seventeenth section of the article, I beg leave to say that I considered the original section in the article as very michievous. When I first read it, it seemed to me that if the combined street railroad companies of the city of New York had undertaken to retain parties to draw a section to create a complete monopoly for them in the city of New York, they could not have done it better than by the incorporation of just such a section as was sought to be put in the article. I tried in vain to get the section amended in three or four particulars when it was in Committee of the Whole, but I failed to get either of them passed except one which I did not consider very important. The section was then, upon the motion of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], and after some remarks in opposition thereto by myself and others, showing its mischievous character, stricken out. I wish now to meet the objection made by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], that by the general law which it is proposed shall be passed by the Legislature for the purpose of building railroads in the streets of cities, any person can go on and put down tracks in any of the streets of the city of New York. Sir, it is the very thing that the general law will provide for. The general law is to provide how, and under what circumstances, and under what conditions, parties may be allowed to lay down tracks in the streets of the city of New York. We cannot provide the necessary details in the section of an article of the Constitution here; and, therefore, it was that they made it the duty of the Legislature to provide by general law, making all the necessary restrictions and conditions to meet every want, every care, and every contingency which human judgment, human foresight, and human wisdom could devise and determine. It could not be done here in a simple section of this article. Still, I have no objection to it, if it can be put in a shape to secure every thing necessary to be provided for in an article of this kind.

Mr. RATHBUN—The gentleman [Mr. Stratton] has forgotten a part of the history of this section which has been stricken out. I desire to call the attention of the Convention to it once more, so that members will see how easy it is to undo work when members are absent after it has been well done. Now, sir, in the Committee of the Whole, when this article was under consideration, there was a very large quorum, and this article was discussed section by section, and the one now under consideration was adopted after a very long discussion, and after having met with the precise opposition stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Stratton] this morning. And after a struggle protracted for almost an entire day, that section was adopted by a large majority. Now, after sleeping upon the Secretary's desk, waiting for other matters to progress, only a few days ago it was called up, and by looking back at the votes which reviewed the work of a large majority of that quorum, I find the work of that article has been overturned, step by step, by votes varying from twenty to twenty-nine in the affirmative. And double the highest number it would not quite form a quorum. I have no doubt that the argument of the gentleman, and all the arguments of a similar character made by other gentlemen, had they been made at the time when there was a full discussion, might have obtained twenty-nine votes that would agree in overturning the work of a large majority of this body. I hope the Convention, without waiting for a discussion of this subject, will go back and take up the work done by a large body of the Convention when nothing was done without a quorum. I can assure the gentleman from New York city that the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature, have not been tampered with by New York railroad companies, or by any body else, and that their only purpose was, in accommodating people of the cities, and to take away from the Legislature a constant disposition to tamper with and trade upon this capital which was considered to be of great value in chartering these city railroads. Look at the reports of the Legislature now. Railroad charter after railroad charter has been introduced, and the same thing is going on that has been going on, and of which, for years, New York has complained, and everybody has complained. The object was to get rid of all that, and leave the matter to the city authorities where it belongs, to leave the people of the city of New York to locate, and control, and manage these railroads as the public convenience demanded—surrendering the whole thing up to the cities. The Convention did so in respect to this article, and I hope, not on my own account, but for the consistency of the Convention, and for the benefit of the cities where those roads are to be built, that the power to locate, and the power to authorize them to be built, will be handed over to the corporate authorities.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Mr. President, it may have been wrong in those gentlemen in the Convention who have left their private business to attend the sessions of this body, when my friend from Cayuga [Mr. Rathbun] was absent, to have gone on and transacted the public business according to their judgment. They may have committed an error, but I hope that my friend will not be very severe upon them, because it might create unpleasantness of feeling in their minds to find themselves thus reprimanded. I think, however, that the Convention, or that those members of it who have not been here, will not be very acrimonious upon us, because we have gone on and done the business for them. I did not rise for the purpose of discussing this question, but simply to say that the long discussions which have been had upon the subject now before the Convention have not tended to convert me to the doctrine that railways in the streets of our cities or towns are an injury to the cities or an injury to the towns. I do not believe they are, and I further do not believe it would be wise here to substantially enact that there never shall be any more railways in towns where railroads exist, as we shall do if we put into the Constitution insurmountable difficulties in the way of having competing lines of roads constructed—competing lines to those roads which are now in the receipt of immense incomes from the monopolies which they enjoy. I have expressed before in this Convention my views upon this question, and I do not desire to dwell upon them further; but I think it would be for the interest of the cities, if there could be a horse railway built in every street in every city of the State, so long as private capital was willing to incur the expense of establishing and maintaining them. I believe it is a necessity of our civilization, and therefore I am opposed to the reinstatement of this section, as a restriction upon further railroads being built.

Mr. FOLGER—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger for the previous question, and it was declared carried.

The question then recurred and was put on the motion of Mr. Livingston to reconsider the vote by which the article on the powers and duties of the Legislature was adopted, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 49 to 30.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I now move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment I proposed was lost.

The PRESIDENT—Has the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston] laid the foundation for his motion?

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I have.

Mr. FOLGER—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger for the previous question, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the amendment proposed by Mr. Livingston to section 21 of the article on the powers and duties of the Legislature, reported by the Committee of the Whole, as follows:

"But no law shall be passed granting the right to construct and operate a railroad within any of the cities, towns or incorporated villages of this State, without the consent of the local authorities of such city, town or village, and also the consent of the owners of at least one-third in value of the property, as fixed by the assessment roll of the previous year, on that portion of each street through or over which the same shall be constructed; or in case the consent of such property owners cannot be obtained, then without the consent of the general term of the supreme court of the district in which such road shall be located; such consent to be obtained and authenticated in such manner as the Legislature shall by general law for that purpose provide."

The question was put on the reconsideration of the motion by which the amendment of Mr. Livingston was rejected, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT announced the question to be on the amendment offered by Mr. Livingston.

Mr. McDONALD—I understood that the previous question only applied to the motion to reconsider.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I desire to offer the amendment, so that in case—

The PRESIDENT—How far did the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] intend that this motion for the previous question should reach?

Mr. FOLGER—I intended it to reach as far as it could. [Laughter.]

Mr. McDONALD—I move to so amend that in case either the local authorities or the residents refuse, then it shall be necessary to apply to the supreme court.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. SILVESTER—I would like to amend the section so that it shall read, "no street railways, etc."

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I will accept that amendment. It was the phraseology used in the original section.

Mr. MURPHY—I move to amend this section by striking out—

The PRESIDENT—Two amendments being already pending, the amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] is not in order.

Mr. MURPHY—One was accepted.

The PRESIDENT—One amendment is offered by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], and to that the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. McDonald] offers an amendment.

The SECRETARY read the amendment of Mr. McDonald as follows:

Insert after the words "property owners" the words "or the local authorities."

Digitized by Google

Mr. McDONALD—I offer this with this idea: I do not consider that the consent of the local authorities should have any more effect than the consent of the local owners of property. I propose to put them both on a level, so that they must apply first to both, and if either do not give consent, then the persons desiring the grant can apply to the general term of the supreme court, who shall have power to grant it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—My objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. McDonald] is that it ignores entirely the principle which lies at the bottom of this whole matter. I conceive that cities have a certain interest in the streets, and that the franchise of laying rails in these streets, as a matter of principle, should not be granted by the Legislature, without the consent of the authorities representing the city. Now, so far as the property owners are concerned, they have but a qualified interest in the streets, and it is, perhaps, more a matter of courtesy than of strict obligation to consult them in relation to the use of the street. The interest of the cities should be protected in this matter, and that can only be done by leaving it somewhat under the control of their respective local authorities. For this reason I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. McDonald].

Mr. RATHBUN—I wish to ask whether the section proposed to be amended by the gentleman did not contain an express provision that there should be the consent of the city authorities?

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I understand the section struck out did contain such a provision.

Mr. HALE—I would ask the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston] whether under such a provision as he proposes, requiring the consent of the local authorities, to what body or what authority application will have to be made for the consent? It seems to me that the term is a very indefinite one, and that there should be some specification as to what officers or authorities in the city shall give the consent?

Mr. LIVINGSTON — I would simply say in answer to the gentleman that my understanding of it would be that it referred to the mayor and common council.

Mr. HALE—Then why not say so?

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Because the section includes incorporated villages and towns which have no mayors.

Mr. ALVORD—While I do not desire to cut off debate on the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston], it seems to me that the matter has been sufficiently explained, and I therefore move the previous question upon the amendment.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. McDonald, and it was declared lost.

Mr. MURPHY—The importance of this subject cannot be magnified. The streets in our cities are fast becoming entirely impassable by carriages or trucks, by reason of these railroads. There are streets in the lower part of New York, the use of which is almost utterly denied for the purposes of public travel other than by these railroads, and the use of which is denied to the owners of property upon those streets. The right to build these railroads has been granted by the Legislature from time to time in extension, if I may so express it, of the general law. The general law authorizing the incorporation of railway companies was not intended to include street railways, and so special acts have almost invariably been passed in aid of the incorporation of such railroads. Other acts have been passed by the Legislature forbidding the local authorities from authorizing the construction of railways in cases where they began and ended in the cities. Now, it is proposed by this amendment to give to the local authorities the right to lay down street railways, with the assent of the people owning the land on the street, or in case they do not consent, then with the assent of the supreme court. Sir, I object to the provision in regard to the supreme court. I do not see how the supreme court is to act in this matter, according to any course or practice of a court. There is nothing judicial in the nature of this question that can properly come under its cognizance. It is making the supreme court not a legal tribunal, but a legislative body. This function is entirely foreign to that court, and its exercise is calculated to lead to inextricable confusion. There is, to my mind, a manifest impropriety in allowing the supreme court to have any thing to do with the subject in that respect because the court may be called upon to pass judicially in regard to the rights of individuals in such cases. The highest court of this State has held, and it is undoubtedly the law of the State, that no street railway can be laid down in cities other than New York except by consent of the owners, or by remuneration to them for the damages that they sustain by reason of the taking of their land for railway purposes. The court of appeals has held that in New York the fee of the land of most of the streets is vested in the city, as a trustee for the public, that the city has control over it, and that the right to build these roads may be granted by the city without the assent of the owners; but in every other city in the State, the owners own by reason of the peculiar language of the highway and street acts to the middle of the street, and these railroads cannot be laid down without the assent of these owners, or a remuneration to them. Now, the supreme court may have to pass upon these questions of right as regards individuals. One or two such cases have arisen in my own practice. Therefore it strikes me that it is particularly improper to make the supreme court a legislative body for the purpose of passing upon this question as to the expediency of granting these railroads. Upon the whole, I would leave this subject without any provision in the Constitution. But if we are to have it, let it stand nakedly with the assent of the authorities and the owners. I move, therefore, to strike out so much of this section as refers to the supreme court.

Mr. OPDYKE—I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston] will be adopted, but I shall have to oppose the motion of my other friend from Kings [Mr. Murphy] for reasons which I will very briefly state. He declares that this is a subject to be left entirely to the Legislature. I think, sir, that there are very good reasons why it should not be thus left. The gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] has told us that we have already adopted a provision requiring the passage of general laws for the construction of railroads in cities. He has also told us, very truthfully, that unless some restriction be made here, it will be in the power of the Legislature to authorize the construction of railroads in any street of any city or village in the State, without requiring the consent of the local authorities or property owners. Now, sir, we have only to look back at the policy which the Legislature has pursued heretofore to determine whether it is proper that that question should be left to them hereafter. It is well known to every member of this Convention that they have taken from the city of New York all right to authorize or prohibit the construction of railroads in the streets of that city, and that they have passed measure after measure, granting franchise after franchise, without money and without price, for the construction of railroads in the city of New York. Now, if that has been their policy in the past, it is not unreasonable to believe that it will be their policy hereafter; and I ask this Convention whether it would be right to foist upon the city of New York railroads in any of the streets of that city without the consent of the people, as represented in their local government. I think that no member of this Convention can in his heart declare that such a policy is right. Sir, it is wrong; it is unjust; it is depriving the citizens of New York, and also the citizens of every other city, of one of their most important rights, in thus forcing upon them, without their consent, that which may be greatly to their detriment. It has been said here by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] that this provision would prevent the construction of other railroads in the city of New York, and would thus greatly benefit the owners of those now in existence. I believe the gentleman is entirely mistaken in regard to that. I think it would not prevent the construction of any new road demanded by the public convenience. I may be permitted now to say a word in reference to another remark which the gentleman made on this subject when it was under debate here before. He insinuated that the advocacy of this restriction by gentlemen upon this floor might have been prompted by personal interest. Now, I do not suppose the gentleman intended to refer to me particularly, but to satisfy his mind upon that point I wish to say that I do not now own, and never have owned, and never expect to own, a share in any street railroad in the city of New York. I do not approve, sir, of the manner in which they have originated, and I will not touch them. The amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston] next requires the consent of one-third in interest of the property owners on the streets in which it shall be proposed to construct railroads. This is a most proper safeguard for the protection of private interests. The street may be devoted to commerce, and so narrow that the railroad would so obstruct it as to unfit it for business, and thus greatly injure the value of the property. Or it might be on Broadway and Fifth avenue, which are the only remaining general thoroughfares for vehicles, unobstructed by railroads, traversing the city between the Battery and the Central Park. In such cases it is proper that the property owners should be consulted and their sanction obtained. But in cases where the public convenience would be promoted, without serious injury to their property, it is proper there should be some power to review, and, if necessary, to overrule, their decision if it be adverse to the application. I can conceive of no better means of relief than this provision which the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] moves to strike out, referring the question to the supreme court. I have no doubt that he is right in saying that it is not a matter to be referred to that court strictly in their judicial capacity, but it seems to me that they may act as arbitrators in such cases as these, involving the question of the public good; and if, in the judgment of that court (for that I suppose is the form in which the question will be presented), the public interests will be promoted by granting the right to build these railroads, then the right will be granted, despite the objection of property owners; and if otherwise, it will be denied. I see no reason why the court, acting in the capacity of arbitrators, might not decide such questions. It is not a legal question; it is simply a question of the public good. If the gentleman can suggest any thing that will better attain the object, and will offer it in place of this, I will very readily assent to it; but if he cannot, I hope this provision will be adopted, as I can see no objection to it in the form in which it is presented.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Nothing was further from my thought than to impute any motive of interest, either to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] who has just spoken, or to any other gentleman of the committee, in connection with this matter. My argument was addressed to the article itself. I contended that the theory would work in the interest of existing railways; not that that was the object or intention in the minds of the gentlemen who drew the article or who advocated it. I wish now to say one word in addition to what the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] has said in regard to the condition of our law as it will be if we adopt this constitutional enactment. As that gentleman well says, in the city of New York, at all events in most of the streets in the city of New York, in the older portions of the city, it is held by the courts that, the title to the streets is in the city, and when the city says the streets may be occupied by railroads, the owners of the adjacent land have nothing to say to it, as their interests are presumed not to be affected. In all the other cities and villages of the State, the courts hold that the owners of the adjacent land own to the center of the street, and no railway can be laid through the streets of any other city or village until the company have procured by purchase from the owners of the adjacent soil, the right to pass through such streets, or until they have proceeded by commission to take the land the same as they would take the inclosed lots in a city, and make compensation to the owners. Even this very week, since I have been sitting in this hall, I have been assured by Judge Peckham, who came in here, that he had granted a decision in my favor, and ordered a perpetual injunction in two cases where the Troy and Boston Railway company had attempted to lay down tracks in my city, without acquiring the title to the lands, and the owners had commenced action for the purpose of ejecting the road from the land, and restraining them from using it hereafter, because they had not obtained the title. And so, in all the cities of the State except the city of New York, we shall require under this amendment, that those attempting to get a railway shall first get the consent of the owners of the land, and then that they shall proceed to take the land by commission, before the roads can be built, so that two processes will have to be gone through with, first getting the consent of the owners, and, second, acquiring the lands by commission. Now, it seems to me that, it would be entirely sufficient if it were provided, as it is now provided by law, that the owners of the land shall be compensated in damages, through the working of our constitutional necessities as they exist at the present time—the constitutional necessities that are imposed upon those who seek to take the lands of private individuals for public uses, without making further provision that consent must be obtained to the taking of the land. I do not see that the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] aids this matter. I think his proposition, if I know how it is to work, is likely to prove an obstruction; that is, if there be no appeal, and if the consent of the people living along the line is to be required. Does the gentleman from Kings mean to leave that in, or does he propose to strike it out?

Mr. MURPHY—My proposition is to strike out so much of the section as refers it to the supreme court to act as a legislative body on this subject, leaving to that court their judicial powers in regard to it. If the gentleman will allow me to add one other remark, I will say that I do not wish that the judiciary of this State shall participate in the giving of these grants, to be charged, as the judges may be, with corruption in their action.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I concur in the wish of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], to save the judiciary from being mixed up in this matter, but if this Convention shall require that the previous consent of the owners of the adjacent soil shall be obtained, and if no alternative shall be furnished, we will certainly in many cases put a perpetual prohibition upon the building of any more roads.

Mr. RATHBUN—The gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] seems to be in doubt about what he does want. He seems to be very anxious that there should be a railroad in every street of every city on account of its most extraordinary convenience; but now he is opposed to leaving it to the authorities of cities to determine the location of these roads unless the rights of the people who own the property along the street are consulted, and the railroad company are to be required to pay the property owners along the entire street. Now, sir, that would be a very interesting operation in a city like Troy or Albany, or Buffalo or Rochester, to go along the streets, where you want to make a railroad five or six miles long, to the owners of the property on each side, the lots for the most part being only twenty-five feet wide, and make application to them to convey their interest, in order that the road might be built. And suppose the owners do not agree to that, then you must have appraisers, and you must appraise all the lots—

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I simply said that was the law now, and I assure my friend from Cayuga [Mr. Rathbun] that that is the law now, strange as it may seem. I have not made the law. And I will say further to my friend from Cayuga, that it is not in the power of this Convention to take away that right from the citizen.

Mr. RATHBUN—I am in no doubt about the law. I have been studying law myself for the past few years. [Laughter]

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—It was first decided in Onondaga county in the case of Williams v.—

Mr. RATHBUN—It has been decided a great many times and on a great many occasions, and, as a general question, it was the law without deciding it at all. Now, then, if you want street railroads, how are you going to get them? You have got to get them by giving the right to the city authorities to determine whether they wish the roads in the city or not. We are not going to trample upon the rights of citizens, but I apprehend that there are occasions when the public interests of the city should govern and should override that imperfect and inchoate right in the soil of the street which is a mere matter of reversion. Now, this provision of law establishes the doctrine that in all cities where railroads are desirable, they shall be constructed by the consent of the public authorities, and located by the public authorities without regarding the absolute rights of the persons owning the land along the street. And if he will not consent, and the public interests require it, the courts shall decide whether a right more imaginary than real shall be given up for the benefit of the public. The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] objects to this amendment on the ground that in New York many of the streets are obstructed and that the ordinary business of the streets is driven out by these railroads. Now, can there be any other way in which the public interests will be better guarded in regard to the construction of railroads in the streets of cities than by intrusting them to the mayors and common councils of cities? Who can do it better? Can the Legislature determine how railroads should be built in New York and Brooklyn, or in any other city? Cannot the local authorities determine, better than any other power, in which of the streets of the city railroads may be constructed so as not to deprive the public of the benefit of the highway? It is precisely for the reason given by the gentleman that it should be left here, and his argument was an argument in favor of instead of against it.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question on this whole subject.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell for the previous question, and it was declared carried and the main question ordered.

The question was put on the amendment of

Mr. Murphy to strike out all relating to the supreme court, and, on a division, it was declared lost, ayes, 34; noes, 47.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. Livingston, and, on a division, it was declared carried, ayes, 58; noes not counted.

Mr. VEEDER—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The previous question having been ordered, debate is not in order.

Mr. VEEDER—Not upon the question of an amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair cannot permit debate, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. VEEDER—Would not a motion to reconsider be in order?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will receive a motion to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. DEVELIN—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the motion lies on the table.

The question was put on the adoption of the section, and it was declared carried.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the article as amended, and it was declared adopted, and referred to the Committee on Revision.

Mr. VEEDER—I move to reconsider the vote by which this article has been declared adopted.

A DELEGATE—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the motion to reconsider lies on the table.

Mr. HISCOCK—I wish to give notice that I will move a reconsideration of the vote by which the article on finance was adopted, and I give notice that if that motion shall prevail, I will move to reconsider the vote by which the eighth section of that article was adopted, with a view to amending that section, by striking out the provision prohibiting State aid to railroads.

The PRESIDENT—The notice will be received.

The Convention then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole upon the report of the Committee on Cities, Mr. RUMSEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the motion of Mr. Spencer to strike out the first section of the article.

Mr. STRATTON—I do not intend to occupy the time of the Convention very long. Heretofore, in most of the discussions in this Convention, I have found the views I entertained so ably expressed by other gentlemen that my labors as a debater here have been comparatively light. On the subject now under discussion, however, I propose to submit a few remarks, as there are some things which have been apparently overlooked by gentlemen who have participated in this discussion, and of which I feel myself called upon to speak as a representative from the city of New York, a city which is more intimately connected with this question, and has greater interests at stake in the action of this Convention in relation to this article and the substitutes which have been proposed for it, than any of the other cities of the State. While I cannot claim, as has been claimed by two of my colleagues who have preceded me, that I was born in the city of New York or that I have resided there all my life, I can say that for many years I have resided there, and have been a close observer of the business and government and of all the institutions of that great and growing city; and I come here from the city of New York not (as was insinuated by one of my colleagues in relation to another) by a vote of the people of the whole State, but by the vote of a portion of the people of the city of New York; and therefore, as a representative of that city, I am the peer of any of the other representatives upon this floor from that city. And I do therefore, in my capacity as a delegate from that city, speak as much for the people of New York as any other delegate upon the floor of this Convention. Now, in relation to this article, I have to say, in the first place, that I adopt the view of the honorable gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] in relation to the sovereignty of the people, and to their being the only sovereign power. But that sovereignty must in a government be represented. This body is the nearest representative of that sovereignty that can be known or recognized in this State, and that sovereignty is now engaged in revising a Constitution embracing rules and regulations having reference to the government of every part of this State. In the discharge of its duty it is bound to give to the people of every part of the State a form of government best adapted to the promotion of the interests and prosperity of the people of every part of the State. It can, however, deal only in general principles, providing for the detail of its plan of government by creating another body, representing that sovereignty, chosen at frequent periods and familiar with the growing wants and changes of a growing State. I admit here that the power of this Convention is sufficient to confer this sovereignty upon any portion of the State. It is not a question of the power of the people whether they will abdicate or abnegate any part of this sovereignty. The right to this self-government which is claimed here by some members of this Convention, the inherent right to this self-government or this sovereignty on the part of any particular portion or locality of this State, I claim does not exist. It can only be conferred by the sovereign power. There can be but one sovereign in the State, but one sovereign power, and one chief executive. Such self-government of a locality can be rightfully claimed by no locality in this State except as a result of a successful revolution, against the sovereign power of the State. The power given to localities for local government does not grow out of any inherent right, but is given because it is more politic, more expedient to delegate that power of local government for particular and local purposes. It has been the policy of this State to confer, through its Legislature, upon cities, the privilege to conduct their local matters in a certain way, under a charter, and which is in its nature but a commission, subject at all times to change or revocation by that Legislature. It is now, for the first time in the history of this State, proposed to confer a portion of this sovereignty on certain portions or localities of this State. And this is founded on the theory of the absolute right of such localities to self-government. If this theory is right, in the nature and fitness of things, if it is an inherent right in itself, or a right which has grown out of a successful revolution against the sovereign power, or as achieved by the cities of the middle ages in their conflicts with the baron and the lord, then we have nothing to do in this Convention but to prohibit the Legislature from exercising any power or control over the localities for which this right is claimed; and this Convention would be going beyond the limits of any power which could be conferred upon a Convention in a civilized State, if it were to do any thing more whatever; because it would be an infringement upon those natural and acquired rights which no Convention in any civilized State would have any right to make, or which it would be proper for them to make. If that right does exist, then we must have half a dozen "Cæsars in Rome," and confusion worse confounded in the execution of the laws of the State, as was demonstrated last evening by the honorable gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham]. But this right is not wholly conceded by this majority report of the Committee on Cities. They would not go so far as to concede that this was a right. It was intimated by the honorable gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] that he had got this whole mighty subject, larger than this whole Convention, as large as the boundaries of the State, and affecting not only the cities of the Empire State, but half, if not all, the cities in this glorious Union—that he had got all this mighty subject compressed down into homeopathic proportions, and confined in a nutshell. Sir, this thing cannot be contained in a nutshell. It involves questions which open like an immense fan, and spread over the whole country. The question which the gentleman had got in a nutshell was this: whether the people of the city of New York are capable of self-government. But there was a principle lying behind that question which the gentleman had not yet cornered in a nutshell, and that was, whether they were, simply by reason of their capacity for self-government, sovereign and independent of the power of the State to govern in every part of the State. But as I have said, the majority report of this committee does not concede this doctrine of the gentleman from Herkimer. It does not concede this right of self-government; for it grants the right as a privilege, and puts in hooks and hampers and all sorts of things, to hold them back in the exercise of it. It holds them back in the whatves and piers, it holds them back in other things. It provides that the mayor may be deposed by the Governor. It dare not acknowledge and establish this doctrine of self-government which is claimed upon this floor by the gentlemen of that committee, but which is not incorporated in the article which they have reported. They do not claim in their article what they claim in debate, that the city of New York is entitled as a matter of right to a government independent of the government of the State. It is therefore left where the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] left it, as a question of mere policy, of mere expediency on the part of the Legislature of the State, on the part of the sovereign people of the State, operating through their Legislature, to determine what is best under the circumstances of to-day; what is best under the growing circumstances of next year; what is best under the changeable circumstances of five years hence; what is best under the great growth and mighty strides in progress of the cities of this State during the next ten years. It is a matter of policy, it is a matter of expediency, and I cannot agree with my learned friend, Judge Daly, when he scouts the idea of this being a matter of policy and expediency, and I put the one judge against the other, the judge from Onondaga against my learned colleague from New York. Mr. Chairman, the plan of the majority of the Committee on Cities, is, in my humble judgment, fraught with dangerous consequences. It denies to the people of the State, no matter what the exigency, the right to legislate for the people of the whole State in regard to the safety of their persons and property, and I do not think that such a provision is either expedient or politic. The city of New York is affected more than any other locality, simply because of its size, because of its importance, because of the great interests involved in it as connected with other portions of the State and country. The people of every part of the State have more intimate relations with the city of New York than with any other one portion of the State. It is the terminus of all our lines of railway. It is the terminus of our canals. They do indeed come out into the Hudson river at Troy and at Albany, but the boats that come down through those canals find their terminus at the city of New York. Thither is transported the products of the north and of the west, and there they find a market. These vast interests being connected with the city of New York, and it being our only gateway to the sea, and the only avenue for our domestic products to reach the great markets of the world, it becomes, from its natural position, of very great importance, and, consequently, very deeply concerned in legislation which affects it. So much for the general principles involved. I now come to the action of the Legislature in creating the present police system, and which seems to have been the first of the so-called acts of aggression on what are called the rights of cities; and with the consideration of that act of aggression, so-called, on the part of the Legislature, I shall yield the floor. The chairman of the Committee on Cities tells us that "the patronage of the police was taken away from the city of New York and given to the central government of the State in April, 1857." What he means by "patronage" is more than he explained in the lengthy argument which he made in support of the plan of the committee. What patronage was taken away from the city of New York? It was the political patronage that existed in the mayor, in the recorder, and in the city judge of New York—their right to appoint what was called the municipal police, which existed prior to the present metropolitan police. The city judge was entitled to so many appointees, the recorder was entitled to so many appointees, and the mayor had the balance, and the police were made up without a question upon political considerations, every man of them a politician, an active politician, every man of them known to be right in the harness and ready for work in the political party from which he received his appointment. That is the "patronage" that was taken away from the city of New York, and the taking of which the learned chairman of the Committee on Cities complains of as such an outrage. They took from the city of New York the power of making political police appointments in the interests of a political party, but the same power was not conferred on any other party. Now, under what circumstances was this "patronage" wrested from that city by this "aggressive" act of an "aggressive" Legislature, "trampling upon the rights" of that glorious city of New York? During the winter of 1857 I was very frequently in the Legislature of this State, and I recollect the honorable gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], then a senator there. I listened one day in the Senate of this State for about an hour to the most convincing, the most exhaustive, and most conclusive argument upon this subject to which I have ever listened, from the then Senator from New York [Mr. E. Brooks], in defense of this proposed system, and in terrible denunciation of the system of which this was to be the successor. His argument at that time convinced me. His argument at that time has never been answered upon this floor, and the Senator himself never will live to see the day that he can answer the argument he then made or explain away the principles which he there enunciated. Besides, as he has had the candor to tell us here, this system grew out of a great necessity and a grievous and growing evil. The government of the city of New York had become corrupt; its police could not be trusted. The administration of criminal justice in that city had become a farce and a scandal, and it was reported upon our streets and in our newspapers that the arrest and punishment of criminals in New York city was a mockery, a fraud on justice and a hollow form. People without distinction of party flocked together in public meetings and sent up such petitions, that as the then Senator himself has told us, one of them lying upon the desk of the President of the Senate hid him from the view of Senators, so great was its proportions. The people came to the Legislature and demanded a change. Mr. A. Oakey Hall came up here and worked all the winter of 1857 to get through this same police system which has been so stigmatized here upon the floor of this Convention. It was by the eloquence of my friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], then an honored Senator from the city of New York, that this bill was carried through the Senate. But we are told by the chairman of this committee that the expedient of this police system has proved a failure and must be abandoned. I only wish that the honorable gentleman had given us some little idea wherein that failure consists, and I would proceed to show that the statement was wrong from beginning to end, and that instead of its having proved a failure, it is one of the most perfect instances of success that has ever been witnessed, one of the most successful systems of its kind that has ever been inaugurated in that city, or in any other city or country upon the face of the globe. I should, as it is, feel constrained to do this, were it not that my colleague [Judge Daly] and others upon this floor, have conceded the fact that the police system of New York is one of the most thorough and efficient systems that has ever existed in that city or in any other city in this country. I therefore consider the argument of the chairman of that committee, in that particular, answered by the frank, candid, and manly admission of my colleague [Judge Daly]. However, if that argument required any other answer the present efficiency of the police would be a sufficient one. But we are told by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] (to whose eloquence we are in great part entitled for this police system), that "the police are selected on party grounds," that "two persons applying for the position of patrolman, one a democrat and the other a republican, the republican is selected and the democrat rejected." It was also charged by my learned colleague [Mr. Lawrence] the other evening, that the police system of New York is a political machine. Now, if this be so, if the Legislature has created any political machine in the city of New York, for the purpose of controlling the police of that city, making them subservient to any political power or purpose, whether it be republican or democratic, my voice shall be for wiping it out, and for putting into the Constitution of this State a provision on this subject so strong and so definite that no Legislature hereafter shall ever mistake it. If this police system is used for partisan purposes, if it be diverted from the use for which it was intended by the Legislature, and if it has become corrupt and a mere instrument of party, then, as I have already said, I stand here ready to incorporate into the Constitution a provision which will prevent the Legislature from interfering in any shape or manner hereafter with the police system of the city of New York. My colleagues, therefore, have me upon the record pledged to vote with them to blot out what they say is a great aggression upon the rights of the people of the city, if they can substantiate the charges which they have made against this police, that it is used for party purposes. It has been stated here, over and over again, by some of my colleagues, that this is a political machine; that it is used in the interests of the republican party; that it was created by the republican party for the purpose of making republican votes in the city of New York, and for the purpose of being used against the interests of the democratic party in that city. I have taken pains to ascertain whether this is so, and to ascertain how the appointments of policemen are made in the city of New York, and I think this Convention ought to understand just how that matter is, and I will detain them for a few moments upon that point. I hold in my hand a brief communication from the chief clerk of the board of metropolitan police, directed to me, in which he says:

"CENTRAL DEPT. OF METROPOLITAN POLICE,
No 300 Mulberry street,
NEW YORK, January 24, 1868.

"The Hon. Norman Stratton, Constitutional Convention, Albany:

"MY DEAR SIR: The president of the board of metropolitan police requests me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of inquiry of the 20th inst., and to furnish you with the information desired.

"QUALIFICATIONS.

"By reference to section 13 of the police law (see page 10 of the manual herewith transmitted), it will appear that members of the force are appointed for life, unless removed for cause. That they must be citizens of the United States, who have never been convicted of crime; able to read and write the English language understandingly; and have resided in the State one year next preceding the appointment.

"These qualifications are fixed by statute. In addition, the rules of the board require the applicants to be not less than five feet seven inches in height, weighing not less than 135 pounds, and free from all diseases and chronic or constitutional physical derangements.

"The standard of character, morals and habits will appear by the petition.

"The first step in seeking an appointment is to procure a copy of the blank petition, which is to be signed by five reputable citizens, and verified by affidavit by one of the petitioners.

"The petition referred to in this letter is as follows:

"To the Board of Metropolitan Police:

"The undersigned request the board of metropolitan police to appoint ——— ——— to be ——— in the metropolitan police force, and individually, and each for himself, states and represents to the board that he has known the said ——— ——— personally, intimately and well for ——— year last past, and is qualified to speak intelligently in relation to his character and habits, and states and represents that said ——— is a man of good moral character, correct and orderly in his deportment, and not in any respect a violator of law or good order—that he is a man of sober, temperate and industrious habits—that he is not addicted to the habitual use of intoxicating drinks, or to other hurtful excesses. The undersigned, each for himself, further represents that he has never seen him drunk, or known or heard of his having been drunk, nor of his having been guilty of, or arrested for, any criminal or disorderly conduct or act. And they further represent, as aforesaid, that he is a man of truth and integrity, of sound mind, good understanding, and of a temper and manners fit to be a policeman. The undersigned are willing and ready at any time to appear at the central department and make affidavit to the truth of the above representations."

The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the PRESIDENT resumed the Chair in Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, by force of the order adopted yesterday the Committee of the Whole is discharged from the further consideration of this article. The Convention will now proceed to its consideration. If there be no objection the order observed in the committee will be observed in Convention. No objection being made, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Stratton] will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. STRATTON—Mr. President, I was proceeding to show the manner of appointing policemen in New York.

"The blank" (which I have read) "is issued only by the commissioners personally.

"When it is returned, signed by five reputable citizens and verified by the affidavit of one of them, the commissioner who issued the blank sends the applicant with a note to the chief clerk to be examined in relation to his legal qualifications.

"Preparatory to that examination, he is required to answer in his own handwriting the questions contained in a prepared blank.

"These questions relate to his age, and many other qualifications, almost as minutely as they are asked by a life insurance company upon issuing a policy, and they are answered under oath. Among these questions are the following:

"In what year were you born?

"Where were you born?

"If out of the United States, have you been naturalized, when and where?

"Can you read and write English?

"Have you been convicted of any crime?

"How long have you resided in this State?

"Where do you now reside?

"Are you married or single?

"If married, what family have you?

"What has been your occupation?

"Are your parents, or either of them dead; if so, at what age and of what disease did they die?

"Have you ever been a policeman?

"Have you paid or promised to pay, or give any money or other consideration to any person, directly or indirectly, for any aid or influence toward procuring your appointment?

"This paper when filled up is verified, as you will see, by the affidavit of the applicant on the back.

"The chief clerk, if all is satisfactory, sends the applicants with papers mentioned filled up and complete before a committee of three police surgeons, by whom he is measured in his naked feet, and weighed without clothing, and subjected to a thorough examination as to his physical condition, including sight and hearing. This scrutiny is very thorough, much more so than the army or navy, for the reason that these men are appointed for life, and if old, diseased or feeble men are appointed the department would become a hospital for invalids.

"If the applicant is found to be sound, the fact is certified by the surgeons on the back of the blank containing the questions."

I wish to call the attention of the Convention for one moment to this. The applicant has, in the first place, been required to find five men who will swear to the statements made in the petition. He then, under oath, answers a long list of questions as to himself, his habits, his family and every thing else which a proper caution could devise as necessary. He then is examined by three police surgeons as carefully as a man is examined to be incorporated into the army of the United States; and after all this, to show the care and the caution—not a word here about politics so far—to show the care and the caution in selecting the best men for these purposes, after all this has been done, a third precautionary step is taken:

"The papers are then referred to the chief clerk, who issues an order to the captain of the precinct where the applicant resides, a blank copy of which is as follows:

"'CENTRAL DEPARTMENT METROPOLITAN POLICE,
No. 300 Mulberry street,
NEW YORK, ——, 186—.

"'No.——

"'Captain —— ——,

"'—— Precinct.

"'SIR: I desire you to make quiet and confidential inquiry as to the character, habits, associates and reputation of —— ——, who resides at ——

"'Report to me in writing, without delay, all the information obtained.

"'Yours, etc.,

"'Chief Clerk.

"'N. B. Prompt and careful attention to this is requested, and report on the back of this paper within three days if practicable.

"S. C. H.'"

And on the back a report is made by the captain of that precinct, after making these most careful and confidential inquiries. The letter of Mr. Hawley continues:

"If this report is favorable he is recorded as eligible for appointment. If it is unfavorable, the name is placed in the category of ineligible. From the list of eligible, appointments are made from time to time, as vacancies occur."

Now, as to the political part of this, Mr. Hawley says:

"I have been chief clerk of the board since 1860"—

[There is no complaint before that time.]

"From that date to 1864, the board was composed of three republicans; from 1864 until March 1, 1866, it was composed of two republicans and two democrats; from that date until the death of Mr. Bergen it was composed of three republicans and one democrat; since the death of Mr. Bergen, of two republicans and one democrat. During all this time more democrats than republicans have been appointed to membership on the force. The number of democrats on the force at this time exceeds largely the number of republicans."

And this is the "republican machine" which a republican Legislature, for the purpose of increasing the republican majority in the city of New York, has instituted and put in force; and yet, with three republican commissioners, they appoint more democrats than republicans. And now, what becomes of this? The police, says my friend Mr. Brooks, are selected on party grounds. "Two persons applying for the position of patrolman, the one a democrat and the other a republican, the democrat is rejected and the republican is selected." And I put that bald statement against the truthful record I have read. Here is a man who has sat with the commission since 1860, at every meeting, and he goes on to say:

"The question of the party politics of the applicant, has never, to my knowledge, been raised or considered by the board. I have never known a divided vote on the question of the appointment of any person to membership."

Always unanimous, the democrats voting with the republicans, and the republicans voting with the democrats, and no one ever raising the question of the politics of the applicant when he was about to be appointed. "And yet this is a political machine," and yet "two persons applying for the position of patrolman, the one a democrat, and the other a republican," by this terrible party machine, the republican is put in power while the poor democrat has the republican foot put upon his neck. My friend is evidently not acquainted with the police system of New York, although he was the founder and father of it. Mr. Hawley further continues:

"Applicants are rejected at every stage of the scrutiny I have attempted to describe. Some are rejected on the chief clerk's examination, because they are not citizens, cannot read or write, have not resided in the State one year, are too old, etc., etc.

"Of those who are examined by the surgeons, a large share are rejected as unsound, too short, or too light in weight. Thus in 1866 there were passed by the surgeons, 664; rejected, 598. In 1867, passed, 566; rejected, 691. 1866 and 1867, rejected, 1,289; passed. 1,230."

It may be that these surgeons are all republicans, and that they have a way of probing and finding out the politics of these applicants, and shoving them off among the rejected if they are democrats. But I have yet to learn but that a majority of the surgeons of that board are also democrats. Mr. Hawley concludes by saying:

"The inquiry into the character of the applicants, conducted by means of the last mentioned blank, was commenced in October, 1866. Since that date seven hundred and ninety-three applicants have been subjected to this scrutiny, and ninety have been set aside by reason of the unfavorable reports, which is eight and three-quarters per cent, about, of those found by this thorough process to be qualified; a considerable number accept other employments, or for other reasons do not come forward to be sworn as members of the force.

"Citizens sometimes complain of the rigor of these proceedings, insisting that the practice is unfair or unjust; but the better judgment is that all these safeguards are necessary and proper.

"With all the care that is taken, men of feeble constitution, of insufficient education, and sometimes men of bad character and habits succeed in evading all the tests to which they are subjected, and become members of the force; greatly to the prejudice of its character and efficiency.

"When the applicant is appointed, he is placed for thirty days in the school of instruction, which he attends in the daytime, under the tuition of experienced officers, to be made familiar with his duties, and at night performs a tour of duty in company with an old patrolman. At the end of the thirty days, if he prove to be competent, he is placed on full duty.

"I am, very respectfully,

"Your obedient servant,

"S. C. HAWLEY,
Chief Clerk, M. P."

Now, Mr. President, that is the manner and that is the form of manufacturing and making the republican policemen in the city of New York, and the condition of the force to-day will satisfy even an unpracticed eye that the force has been selected with the greatest care. Approach any one of those men upon any one of the streets in New York, you being a stranger, and ask him your nearest way to any point in the city, and you are met by a gentlemanly response. You are told the best route by car or stage to take to reach it, and you are shown every facility that any person is entitled to from a public officer. They are not the political rabble of which this Convention might have supposed them to be composed, upon hearing the remarks of my colleague [Mr. A. R. Lawrence] and others upon this floor. They are not the political rabble which were appointed by the mayor, recorder, and city judge of the city of New York, known as the municipal police. They are not appointed upon any political ground, and I know from my own investigations, that in some wards of the city of New York the democratic policemen outnumber the republican policemen as three to one. In my own ward, which is the strongest republican ward in the city of New York, the republican policemen, as compared with the democratic policemen, are not in a majority. And there is not a single ward in the city of New York, as I am credibly informed, where the majority of the policemen are republicans. Besides, they never mix in politics. They have a right to go up to the polls, as any other citizens, and deposit their votes. I am glad that right is conceded to them. They have that right but they never attend as politicians at public political meetings. I am glad that the police of New York has been kept free from party politics, and it was to take it out of the slum and out of the rascalities of the politics of the city of New York, that the present system was inaugurated and instituted. I could not use a more happy or a stronger argument, perhaps, than by saying just what I have said, and which, if my memory serves me right, was one of the strongest points made by my learned friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] in his argument in advocacy of this system, when a Senator of this State "that it was to take it out of the slum of political rascality in the city of New York, that we should have a system that should be free from the politicians, and under which they should not direct affairs for the benefit of any particular party." I wish he were with me now, to keep this police free from party politics, instead of trying to put it back under municipal and political control. I have no objection to the mayor of the city of New York being a member of that board; I think he ought to be. But that system, to which we are indebted for our protection by day and by night, which shields us from the robber, which shields us from the garroter, which shields us from the midnight assassin, so that when we walk home at a late hour of the night, and meet one of these men in blue we feel a safety creeping over us—that force, that police power, we want kept free from party contaminations, and it can only be done by keeping the system which has shown for the last ten years, when the commissioners were not only in a republican majority, but when every member of the force for a number of years were republican, that it was not used for party purposes. There has never been a party in the city of New York strong enough to control the commissioners of the metropolitan police—to compel them to use their force for any party purpose whatever. It stands well in contrast with the former system. It has done all that was claimed would be done by it when my friend, Mr. E. Brooks, in the Senate, so ably advocated its passage into life. It has accomplished all that he prophesied would be accomplished by it. It has given us a better system than we ever before had. Men may and do change, principles remain. The principles which he there enunciated in advocacy of this system will live forever, for they are the principles adapted to every age and people under like circumstances, and to which we might with very great propriety apply the song of the brook:

"Men may come and men may go,
But I flow on forever."

Mr. President, I do not intend to pursue this discussion at any great length further. I have vindicated the police system of the city of New York, which I felt it my duty to vindicate, as it had been wrongfully assailed here without proof and without justice. I have no sympathy for that style of debate which lugs in all the ad captandum of a political speech upon the floor of this august body. I come to this Convention not as a politician. If I could not have come here except in a political character I would have staid at home. I utterly sink the politician in the discharge of my duties here. I have nothing to do with party politics here. "They may come, and they may go." They may change a dozen times within the next twenty years; other issues may come up; other principles may arise, and other things may engross the attention than those which now control the political parties of to-day. We come here to deal with great and fundamental principles of government, such as will affect the growth, prosperity and happiness of the State for a generation of time, independent of any of the present political considerations of the day. As to the riots of 1861 and 1863, of which my friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] has spoken, I will only in passing say that they were not, as asserted by my friend, composed of the same material. The riots of 1861 were not riots. They were, in the language of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Schumaker] last evening, a mass of "gentlemen." In a time of great political turmoil, when every body was anxious to know who was who, and what was what; who was on our side, and who was on the other side, and when that was thought to be best determined by the display of the stars and stripes on the public buildings where they had facilities to display them, there were a number of gentlemen congregated in the City Hall park—I think it was after the defeat of General McDowell at Bull Run, when there was a great deal of crowing by the copperheads of New York over the defeat, and they claimed that the war should now be at an end. Then a party of gentlemen started in the neighborhood of certain newspaper offices and demanded that they should hoist the stars and stripes. I was passing down from the City Hall in the pursuit of my profession when I saw standing around the office of the New York Express I should judge five or seven hundred men, perhaps more, I did not stop to count them. I stood on the edge of that crowd. I ascertained that they were determined to have the stars and stripes thrown to the breeze over the Express office, and I stood there till I saw it done, and then I joined with the others when that flag was thrown to the breeze in giving three cheers for the old flag. But my friend tells me that in that crowd some lost their watches and some their pocketbooks. Now, it could not have been composed of the same material as the crowd of 1863, for that crowd did not have watches or pocketbooks, that I saw, unless they took them from somebody else. But some of this crowd, he says, lost their watches and pocketbooks. I went away without losing mine, nor did I have any body's else in my pocket, and I did not see any body in that crowd who appeared disposed to violate the rights of property. It was as orderly a crowd as I ever saw gathered in the streets of New York. The only object was to test the loyalty of certain newspaper offices. They went from there to the Herald office, and there they had the stars and stripes thrown to the breeze, and then to the Journal of Commerce office where they had a little more difficulty in getting the flag to the breeze; but they finally succeeded, I believe, in getting the flag out there. No private rights were interfered with, and there was no necessity for the interference of the police. It is claimed, Mr. President, in conclusion, that this increased expense of the police department, as portrayed by my colleague [Mr. A. R. Lawrence] the other evening, is of such magnitude that the people have tired of it and are determined to blot it out; and yet he tells us in the next paragraph that the taxes of New York, notwithstanding this immense increase, are less than in a great many of the other cities of this State, coming down to about the fifth or sixth in rank. Now he says that the electors of the city do not like these figures, as they showed by the return of the last election. I have heard the lesson of that last election attributed to a great many different things. Now it is claimed that it was the police question, that this police system was in direct issue before the people, and that the people by their vote decided against the police system. Nothing could be farther from the truth. It was not the police. Others claimed that it was the excise law; others that it was the health law that they passed upon; and others that it was the enforcement of the Sunday law; and still others claimed that it was none of them, but it was the great national question of the negro; that that vote decided against negro suffrage; that the whole tenor and the whole voice of that vote was against negro suffrage, and that it meant just that and nothing more. It is as "elastic" and "flexible" as the judiciary section of my friend from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh]. You can use it for almost any purpose, and it will fit almost anywhere. Sir, that great vote in the city of New York last year was temporary and accidental. It was the result of a combination of circumstances, among which was ten thousand fraudulent and illegal votes, according to the admissions of a democratic paper in the city of New York. That result is not chargeable to the commissions in New York at all. With all the commissions that existed there, in the last election for members of Congress the republican party polled thirty-seven thousand votes in the city of New York for their members of Congress, not counting the republicans in my district who voted for Thomas E. Stewart, who was a republican, but who was nominated by the democrats, and who has voted principally with the republicans in Congress. Thirty-seven thousand independent of those; and that with all the commissions. Now how is the falling off of the republicans in the city of New York, which my democratic friend [Mr. A. R. Lawrence] talked so much about, and seemed to be so sorry for, to be affected by commissions? Mr. President, it was not the commissions. No; rum had run riot in New York. Avocations were being shamelessly prosecuted, regardless of the public morals or public health, or the restrictions or prohibitions of law. Lawlessness in those matters had been running riot in New York. The Legislature of this State, upon the application of many citizens of New York, for no purpose of creating any board, made an excise law. They forbade the selling of liquor on Sunday. They forbade the keeping open of places where liquors were sold, after twelve o'clock at night; and then made it the duty of the police to see that the law was executed. Before, it had been said, "You cannot execute a license law in the city of New York. You cannot do it. You cannot execute a law that will shut up drinking saloons on election days, on Sunday, and every night after twelve o'clock." But this abused police, this "republican" police did it. They did close the liquor shops. They did completely suppress twenty-five hundred of the worst, most corrupting and loathsome groggeries in the city of New York, and effectually shut them up. They did shut up other pest-holes, which, if allowed to be kept open, would have sent a miasma and pestilence not only through the city, but over the whole State and country. They did it promptly and effectually, as they perform every duty imposed on them by law, and they shut off the pestilence from your home, gentleman from Herkimer, and they shut off the pestilence from your home. Mr. Chairman of the committee; they did it all; the police did it; they did execute the law, unpleasant and unpopular, as it may have been. But, then, we have a population in New York, described by the eloquent gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], who are voters, and who can outvote the lovers of law and order, and they come up without regard to any former political alliance, without regard to any thing but the fancied or real interference by the execution of the excise and health laws with their business or pleasures. Our German friends who had been interfered with by the enforcement of the Sunday law were aggrieved and exasperated by what they deemed an unwarrantable and unjust interference with their natural rights, and every nationality that had been interfered with in the exercise of any of the habits of their ancestors, not by these commissions, because I have shown you what a vote we polled under all the commissions, but because of the enforcement of these rigorous laws—because, perhaps, of their too rigorous enforcement by the police. I am not advocating their enforcement. I am speaking only of causes and results. I would have a different excise law from that which prevails in the city of New York and a different enforcement of the laws. But I say this: I say it was because of that great change that was made in the city of New York, making its Sabbaths as quiet as they are in the village of Herkimer, gentlemen from Herkimer—as quiet as in any country village in the State, a quiet which had not been experienced in that city for many years—it was because this was done, because of the great change made in the habits of indulgence of this class; it was the revolution against the shutting up of all these places, that caused the temporary and accidental majority of the democratic party in the city of New York last fall; and no men were more astonished at that majority than the democratic party of the city of New York themselves. But that is the history of it, that is the reason of it, and that is the cause of it. Now, who asks for the abolition of this police system? I do not know of any citizens of New York who have asked its abolition. Delegates upon this floor representing the city of New York, as I do, ask for it. I, as a delegate here from the city of New York, protest that the people of the city of New York do not ask for it. But I tell you who does ask for it. Every rogue "that fears the halter draws;" every man who wants to keep a policy shop open; every man who wants to keep a house of prostitution open; every man who wants to commit any nefarious acts, to live by his wits and his robberies, is opposed to the police system. It is the worst class of our people who are opposed to this police system, and they are opposed to any system by which the laws are surely executed and the citizens faithfully protected in life and property. Now, I invite and challenge a contradiction of the statements I have made here in relation to the political status of the police force of the city of New York, and, Mr. President, if I am right in the statements which I have thus far made, what shall we think of the statements that have been made on the other side of this question, that these police commissioners were exercising their power as politicians, that they were obeying the behests of a political Legislature to trample upon the sacred rights of the people of the city of New York? Those rights have never been invaded by the Legislature. There has been no interference on the part of the Legislature of this State by any commission which they have established in the city of New York but what has proved a blessing to that city, but what has taken the place of something which had become corrupt and damaging, but what has been an evangel of mercy and blessing to the downtrodden and robbed people of that city—downtrodden and robbed by their own corrupt legislation, and by their own short-sightedness and folly in sending to their own local legislature characters of the stamp they do, where rules of order and decorum are adjusted and settled by the arbitrament of the flying inkstand. But this police had had imposed upon it other duties. The Legislature, in its wisdom thought proper to create a bureau of election statistics and made that bureau a part of the duties of the commissioners of police of the metropolitan police district. We have now what is complained of by the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence], and of which he says in such emphatic language, "This is not right"—the appointment of inspectors of registry and election and canvassers and poll clerks of election. But how are those appointments made? One would suppose from hearing my friend [Mr. A. R. Lawrence] that they were all of one political party. Each party, as my democratic friends here will bear me witness, each party sends to the police commissioners a list of names for the appointment of inspectors, canvassers and poll clerks. There are four inspectors, two canvassers and two poll clerks for each election district. The republicans also send their list and the commissioners take two inspectors from the democratic list and two from the republican list; one canvasser from the democratic list and one canvasser from the republican list, and one poll clerk from each of these lists, for each election district in the city of New York. Does the democratic party want all the inspectors; do they want all the canvassers; do they want all the clerks? I am a republican, and I believe that the republican party is as honest if not the most honest party that ever had an existence; and yet I would not trust that party with all the canvassers, and all the inspectors, and all the poll clerks. It is a power that ought to be divided between the two parties, and it is properly and rightfully divided when we make them half of each political party, each party choosing their own men and the police simply selecting them so that they shall be officers of police, and so that they can control their action and their report. The boxes are kept at the police stations. At sunrise on election morning these glass boxes are delivered to the inspectors, who have charge of them until sundown, when they are passed over to the canvassers. The canvassers are protected by the police during their canvass, and as soon as finished the poll clerk hands to a policeman the result of the canvass, signed by both poll clerks, and transmits his original tally of that canvass to the bureau of election statistics, and that policeman at once takes that certificate to head-quarters, and there it is deposited in this election bureau. This prevents fraud by these canvassers colluding together and finding a vote for any candidate that never was polled for him; for this poll clerk's return is in the bureau of election statistics in the head-quarters of the police department, and is a check upon any fraud of the canvassers. I tell you, the system is complete, gentlemen. I tell you that it will prevent, as far as human ingenuity, and human foresight and human judgment and precaution can do it, frauds in our elective franchise; and without this protection we are gone, and our boasted right of the elective franchise will become a mockery and a delusion. Do we want a board of police or any other board that will give to one political party, I care not which it is, all these officers, all these tests upon the purity of the elective franchise? God forbid! But, sir, although not having gone through with the argument that I sketched for myself upon this occasion, I have trespassed upon the time of the Convention to a greater extent than I had intended. I will therefore bring these remarks to a close by saying that I trust that this first section of this article may be stricken out, and that in its place we may incorporate a system which will be more in accordance with our republican institutions, which will give greater security not only to the people of the city of New York, but to the citizens of all the State and all the nation whose business calls them so frequently into the metropolis of the nation. This can be done; this, by a wise and prudent consideration, will be done, and this being done will be satisfactory to all concerned, and will prove a bond of peace, harmony and good will between all sections of our great and growing State, binding them together, not by small geographical localities, but by one common sentiment of pride and jealous care for the protection, prosperity and progress of every city, village, town and inhabitant, and because they are integral parts of our beloved commonwealth.

Mr. HARRIS—Mr. President —

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will state the pending question. The first section is under consideration. Are there any amendments proposed to this section?

Mr. HARRIS—I have no desire at all, Mr. President, to prevent any gentleman from expressing his views upon the question pending. This motion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] —

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] that that motion is not now pending. There is no motion before the Convention; but amendments are in order to the first section of this article. The Committee of the Whole having made no report, no motion made in it is now before the Convention.

Mr. CURTIS—I propose a substitute to the first section now under consideration.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] has the floor.

Mr. HARRIS—I was about to move the previous question on the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], but if that is not now pending, I have no motion to make.

The PRESIDENT—There is no such motion before the Convention.

Mr. CURTIS—I propose as a substitute for the section under consideration the first section of the minority report signed by Mr. Murphy, document No. 109. I think it will be found Mr. President, that this section covers all the desirable points that are sought in the section reported by the majority of the committee, except such as have arisen during the debate. It is more precise in its language, and seems to me altogether better. The section reads as follows:

SEC. —. There shall be chosen every two years by the electors at large of every city, a mayor, who shall be the chief executive officer thereof, and whose duty it shall also be to see that the duties of the various city officers are faithfully performed. He shall have power to investigate their acts, to have access to all books and documents in their respective offices, and to examine their subordinates on oath. He shall also have power to suspend or remove such officers from office, whether they be elected or appointed, for violation or neglect of duty, to be specified in the order of suspension or removal; but no such removal shall be made without reasonable notice to the party complained of and an opportunity afforded him to be heard in his defense.

This seems to me, Mr. President, to be a precise definition of the proper duty of the mayor of a city more acceptable to me than that reported by the majority, now pending. I therefore offer it as a substitute.

Mr. OPDYKE—If it is in order I move to amend by substituting the first section of the article reported in document No. 138—another minority report from the Committee on Cities.

The PRESIDENT—That motion is in order.

Mr. OPDYKE—I make that motion for the reason that I desire an expression of the judgment of this Convention on that report, as a whole. I think this Convention will perceive that both the majority report and the minority report, the first section of which I now offer as a substitute, present more comprehensive and specific plans of city government than that offered by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]—the minority report signed by Mr. Murphy. I think it is proper that this Convention, after the long discussion we have had on the whole subject of the government of cities, should give a vote on each, and thus manifest its preference between the three plans. I will not detain the Convention by repeating any arguments that I have made in support of my proposed substitute, more than to say that, in my judgment, it presents a plan that will produce a better state of things than either of the other plans before the Convention; and I am satisfied from the debate that in all its leading features, save one, the sentiment of this Convention concurs with me in the view which I take, and concurs with me in the propriety of framing, as perfectly as we can, a general plan for our city governments, to be filled up by the Legislature. I think it concurs with me in the propriety of excluding from that plan and from the power which that plan will confer upon localities, the police interest, the sanitary interest, and the commercial interest, being each and all interests in which the whole State are concerned. I am aware that the dividing line between interests which are purely and solely local—interests in which the residents of localities alone are interested, and those which by connecting links affect interests in other parts of the State, is most difficult to define. I am aware that the term "commercial interests" is not as definite and distinct as I should desire it to be; and if this report should be adopted I am free to say that on that point and some others, amendments will, in my judgment, be necessary. I think, for example, that the fire department in cities, and especially in the city of New York, which protects the property there belonging not only to the citizens of that city, but to the citizens of various parts of the State, and of the United States, is really a commercial interest—an interest in which the people of the whole State are concerned. For that reason I am inclined to believe that it is proper that the central government which represents the whole State should have some control over that interest. Now, sir, the only point on which I think this Convention is not prepared to go with us in this report is in that feature which requires the boards of aldermen and the comptrollers of the cities of New York and Brooklyn to be elected by the tax payers. I name these two cities because in regard to them I have better knowledge and can speak with more confidence. For one I should be perfectly content to apply this rule to every city in the State, but with regard to that point I think that in relation to other cities, those by whom they are more immediately represented will be better able to speak in their behalf. I desire to say a few words in relation to the proposition to engraft into the Constitution a feature that will make the government of cities one of checks and balances. The proposition is that the government of a city, so far as regards its mayor and one branch of its legislative power and and all its subordinate officers, shall be controlled by the voice of the whole body of electors, but that, on the other hand, there should be a check to the power and the action of that body of electors through a legislative board and a comptroller chosen by those paying taxes. As I have said before, this question of the government of cities is not a question affecting civil or political rights. If it were, I would be the last member of this Convention to make the proposition. But, sir, I beg to repeat that we are here to look for the best means of securing good government, good government to the State, good government to every locality in the State; and the question for us to determine is whether this plan is best calculated to do it; and also whether it will abridge any of the rights, whether it will infringe any principle of justice with regard to that class of electors who are excluded in the election of the board of aldermen and comptroller. I maintain that it does not abridge their personal or their political rights. All those are under the safeguard of the central government of the State. They are subject to the laws of the State in all their civil and personal rights, in all their social relations. They are subject to the judiciary of the State in the adjustment of all those rights. They are subject to the police force created by the State, in their personal rights, their protection from trespass, and their freedom from arrest. In all regards, therefore, save that which relates to property and to property alone, they have all the rights of those who vote for members of the board of aldermen. Now, sir, we have but to look back a little to see what has hitherto been the sentiment of the people of this country. Let us look back and see what was the sentiment of those who founded our government theoretically on the broadest principles of political equality. We find that when they came to put that government into action, they began with the elective franchise, which, I repeat, is but a franchise, to be conferred or withheld, as the public good may demand, they began on the basis of property alone, that those who owned, or were in some way connected with property, alone should vote for any elective officer. We have been going down, extending that franchise, until we have made it to comprehend almost every adult male citizen. Sir, the Congress of the United States, in my judgment, committed a great and a dangerous error in conferring that franchise on nearly half a million of men just emerged from the benighted ignorance of slavery. I believe it was a serious error. For one, I want to look at this question with my best judgment, and provide the best government for cities that can be provided. If any limitation that does not infringe personal rights will give us more justice and a better government in cities, I want it adopted. I desire now to see how many members of the Convention agree with me in that proposition. For that reason I hope that the substitute I have offered will receive the support of every member who conscientiously believes it to be the best method of securing the end we all desire.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the substitute offered by Mr. Opdyke, as follows:

SECTION 1. The executive power in cities shall be vested in a mayor, who shall be elected by the electors of the city, and shall hold his office for one year. He shall take care that the laws and city ordinances are faithfully executed. He shall receive at stated times for his services a compensation to be established by law, and which shall be neither increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall be elected. He shall not receive during that period any other emolument from the city, nor shall he hold any other office.

Mr. CURTIS—The section reported by the minority and signed by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] is evidently the work of great experience and of great thought. For myself, sir, when it comes to the test question which he proposes to apply, and which I will remind him is not raised in the first section, which is now under consideration, I shall certainly support the views which he has so strongly, and, as I think, so conclusively urged. There are other sections of his report which are deserving of the same consideration; but in the specific section under consideration, it will be observed that the report signed by the gentleman does not provide for an emergency which is the occasion of very general complaint. One of the chief complaints against the present position of the mayor of New York is, that he is really without power. The article reported by Mr. Murphy in the section which I offer as a substitute, gives to the mayor the immediate supervision of the other city officers, the local, immediate supervision; and it is in that respect, as it seems to me, preferable to the section reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke].

Mr. OPDYKE—The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] will find by turning to the report, that in another section that is provided for.

Mr. CURTIS—It is unquestionably true, as I said before, that that article further provides for the necessity; but as I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke], he wishes to make this a test question, and it does not contain a certain point in his article which is very essential if not absolutely essential to the coherence and perfection of that article. I therefore insist upon the amendment I have offered.

Mr. DEVELIN—I would like to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. Harris], if there is any essential difference between the article proposed by the committee in the majority report, and that of Mr. Opdyke, so for as regards this section, except the term of office?

Mr. HARRIS—That is the essential difference between the two sections. The first section of Mr. Opdyke's report makes the term of office one year, and has nothing in it prohibiting the re-election of the mayor. The report of the committee, as the gentleman knows, is three years and ineligibility. The section of Mr Murphy is two years and no ineligibility.

Mr. GROSS—Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the majority report of the Committee on Cities, with the reservation that I should like to see substituted for the first section of the article something like the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy]. My own democratic convictions, as well as the history of governments, teach me that decentralization of power and direct participation of the people in the management of public affairs form the true principles upon which a free and popular government ought to be established, and which should guide its administration and development. The more we strive to familiarize the masses with the management of public affairs, the nearer we come to the ideal of popular government. I have followed this principle since my entrance into public life, and I hope to adhere to it to the end of my days. To trust to any part-representative of the great body of the people—be it a Congress, a Legislature, an Executive of a State or of the nation, a judiciary or a convention—as little discretionary, implied, or arbitrary power as is compatible with a practicable and successful direction of public affairs, is, in my opinion, the great end to be aimed at, is republicanism to the core, is democracy embodied in public life, and comes nearest to the fulfillment of the manifest destiny as pointed out for this great republic by the Declaration of Independence and by the Constitution. And although I grant that circumstances may arise where the concentration of greater power in the hands of a few or of one representative of the people is made necessary or expedient, even in a republic, the fact of the existence of a standing army and navy in our own midst, and of its direction, under rules and regulations dissimilar from those applicable to civil service, is a perennial illustration of the case, I am nevertheless opposed, as unrepublican and anti-democratic, to all special pleading toward that end, and am particularly surprised to see gentlemen indulge in such special pleading for centralization of power contrary to the will and wishes of those to be affected by it, who belong to a party that has inscribed on its banner the motto, "equal rights," and "universal suffrage." I appreciate and cherish this motto of the republican party, and though a member of the democratic party, I have lived up to it. Dissenting in this respect from many of my fellow democrats, I have expressed myself in favor of it, not only before this honorable body, but as early as 1866, and long before the republican party was a unit on it. But in making this declaration for "equal rights and universal suffrage," I was really in earnest about what I said; I meant "equal rights and universal suffrage" for all, for white men as well as black men, democrats and conservatives as well as republicans and radicals, southerners as well as northerners—meant it for those who have been loyal always as well as for those who had been disloyal once. I did not indulge in any special pleading on this great point of extending and enlarging our theory and practice of popular government and people's rights; I did not demand exceptions here and prohibitions there; I did not understand it that white men who had rebelled against their government and got terribly punished for their crime or folly should be visited with disfranchisement, and that black men who had aided them in their rebellion should be rewarded with enfranchisement. I could not adopt this view of the case, as I had never been made sure on that one point: whether there had been more involuntary white or black rebels at the South. Being uncertain on that point, and withal abhorring the idea that a proposition at once so noble, human, and liberal as the one above cited, could include the mental reservation of vindictiveness, proscription and revenge, I was verily shocked at making the discovery that this republican motto in reality meant all what it expresses for the negro, but military despotism, slavery and ruin for the white man of the South, and nothing at all for the naturalized Americans all over the country, who, as I venture to suggest, had certainly done their share in the preservation of the government, and who had neither been voluntary nor involuntary aiders and abetters of the rebellion; and who, also, as I dare further submit, contribute as much to the development of the resources of the country as the extolled African, or, perhaps, a little more. Well, sir, this superb republican motto proved in the end nothing but special pleading for one class of people to the disparagement, humiliation, and injury of a second, and the neglect and discountenance of a third one. After having discovered the true meaning and intent of this demand for equal rights and universal suffrage by our republican friends, I could no longer be astonished at the advocacy here on this floor, and in reference to the pending subject, of a policy which is in flat contradiction to all and every thing these gentlemen and their party endeavor to carry out and perpetuate in another section of the country. While gentlemen in this hall array themselves against the full and proper exercise of self-government on the part of the most intelligent, practical, enlightened, successful and progressive community on this continent, and perhaps on the whole face of the earth, they claim all that is denied to the citizens of the metropolis for the so far assuredly most uneducated, ignorant, indolent, unsuccessful and depending class of people elsewhere. Indeed, sir, the republican programme on matters of self-government, as laid down for the black man of the South, is irreconcilable to the one recommended for the poor whites of the city of New York. If what has been thrown out here in regard to the propriety or necessity of guarding a great community against its own failings and implied incapacity, shall be received as the naked truth and veritable state of facts, a more scathing rebuke and forcible condemnation of all that the republican party has aimed at and carried out in a national respect, has never been uttered. Now, sir, I can't appreciate such one-sided rule. I can't perceive the terseness of an argument that denies to educated self-depending white men what it grants to ignorant, helpless negroes; and yet, sir, that is exactly the position in which I find my respected friend from the great city [Mr. Hutchins]. He pleads against self-government of more than one-third of the inhabitants of the State, if we speak of the cities of New York and Brooklyn alone, and of more than one-half of the same if we include all the other cities from 5,000 population up. And what are his reasons for so doing? First, and above all others, a tender solicitude for the continuance of certain commissions with which the State Legislature has saddled the great cities. His special pleading in their behalf was ingenious and eloquent, but it failed to give us the sense of the communities in question, and was not overscrupulous in the statement of certain facts. From a few notes taken of the speech of the learned gentleman as he delivered it, I shall endeavor to prove the correctness of this, my assertion. Should I misinterpret any of the utterances of the honorable gentleman it will be unintentional and, as I hope, be pardoned on account of my somewhat impaired hearing. We are told that the city of New York has among its 132,000 voters 77,000 of foreign-birth and only 55,000 native born. Believing that this statement is substantially correct, I cannot see what it has to do with the government of the city, if not made for the purpose of proving from this great proportion of inhabitants born in other countries the propriety or necessity of State control over it. I shall answer for one portion of this naturalized element of population, representing upward of thirty thousand voters, that it is orderly, peaceable and law-loving to an extent, that, but for the chicaneries of an injudicious excise law and similar reprehensible enactments, the smallest proportion of arrests have uniformly been made amongst it. Two of the most populous and crowded wards, inhabited by the proportionally poorest classes of people, the eleventh and the seventeenth, containing one hundred and fifty thousand souls, on a comparatively small area and in hundreds of crowded tenement houses, are, with the exception of an extreme river portion, called Mackerelville, the safest to walk through at all hours of the night. I have lived in these two wards since 1851 and know them intimately. These two wards are a little muddy, because generally neglected by our aristocratic high-toned street sweeper; they are occasionally a little noisy on account of the many social fellows dwelling therein, who like to sing and to dance, and love music and fun; but as stated, they are safe to walk through day and night, as I best know from my own experience. Now, five-sixths of the people of these wards are either foreign born themselves or descended from foreigners in the first generation. If they are orderly and law-abiding to such an extent, is not that proof of their capacity for self-government? Bawdy houses, gaming tables, sporting places, Peter Funk shops, cock pits and similar nocturnal or forbidden retreats and abodes of the rowdies and lawless, are almost unknown in these wards. Very little law breaking, indeed, would occur, if not occasionally an indiscreet or impertinent guardian of the excise regulations or a drunken, half-crazy, murderous patrolman—I hint to facts not to fictions—would create a row and exasperate the people, as has been the case but a few weeks since in the seventeenth ward, where such a minion of Kennedy knocked down and shot at every body coming in his way, going so far as to run out of his district in order to have the satisfaction of clubbing a citizen, who was just in the act of helping his wife and little child from a car and over the slushy street to the sidewalk, while a moment after that a citizen, who gave vent to his indignation, received a mortal shot wound in the bowels, his life being still in danger at this very hour. Sir, the apologists or admirers of the New York police may call outrageous occurrences like this one, exceptions, and pronounce the general conduct of the police exemplary over again. I answer them, that such outrageous conduct, on the part of the police is, to my positive knowledge, of almost daily occurrence, while riots, of which gentlemen talk so much and know so little authentically, are really rare exceptions in such a great city with such a mixed population. Yet I do not make this assertion for the mere purpose of contradicting what has been said by other gentlemen on this floor, but I am ready to substantiate it a hundred times, if the necessary allowance of time for collecting such evidence is granted me. The number of arrests made in a month or in a year by the metropolitan police force are paraded before us in order to serve the twofold object of showing at once the efficiency of the police and the viciousness of the people of New York city. Sir, how are these fifty thousand arrests made up? I give you one instance for a hundred that I could give to show how they are made up. One Sunday evening were congregated at the Dramatic Hall—a respectable public place in Houston street, near Bowery, the abode of a number of singing societies—the members of a German glee club, for the purpose of practice and rehearsal. One of the benches for the attending audience—friends of the singers—was occupied by a bevy of lovely, innocent girls, just arrived from the old country and brought hither by some of their relations. All at once, while chatting away or quietly listening to the performances of the singers, these young ladies, with many others, were rudely set upon by a squad of police that broke into this private room, dragged out of the building and over the streets to the station house, here to be thrown into a dungeon reeking with bad odor and swarming with vermin, and to be locked up for the night. While the arrested New Yorkers, used to such performances of our valiant police, reconciled themselves to their fate, these unsuspecting young ladies were almost frightened to death, and given up to utter despair throughout the night. That was the reception these cultivated and decorous strangers met with in a country which their parents had been induced to seek on account of the much praised rights and liberties enjoyed by its citizens. They had lived under a monarchy and had all their lifetime been accustomed to a rigorous, stringent system of police, but a rudeness and brutality as exhibited by our metropolitans, was new to them, and, of course, gave them a poor idea of the freedom, rights and privileges of American, or rather of New York citizens. Now, sir, this is the way in which, with more or less variations, the bulk of the fifty thousand arrests is made up Ten, twenty, or more, orderly, harmless and decorous people are seized upon at once by a brutal police, dragged to the station-house and locked up for no reasonable cause or excusable object whatever, next day or month to be paraded in the police reports as so many arrests for "disorderly conduct," "disturbance on the street," violation of the excise law," "drunkenness," and so forth. Sir, if you will examine a specified report on these trumped up arrests by the metropolitan police, you will probably find that three-fourths of them all fall within the category just mentioned, that is, would have been found unnecessary and easily avoidable by a police instructed to treat with respect and to protect the unoffending, orderly citizen under all circumstances, instead of being instructed to work year in and year out, directly or indirectly, for political effect and party purposes mainly. Great are these metropolitans in the prosecution of singing societies, excursionists, lager-beer venders and other harmless people, but comparatively little they achieve in the way of detecting or arresting theft, burglary, murder and arson, etc. There lived but a few weeks ago, near the corner of Eighteenth street and First avenue, an unobtrusive young man, butcher by trade, happy in the consciousness of carrying on a prosperous little business in his line, which made it possible for him, from time to time, to send money to his poor, aged parents in far off Hungary. The sole cause to mar the happiness of this dutiful son was the infection of the street corner near his stand by a number of yonder "loafers," who are the curse and the reproach of this great country. A more vicious, cruel, fiendish, heartless and abject species of human kind, with the exception perhaps of the Thugs of the far East, is not to be found on the face of the globe. Uniformly born and reared in the place which they infest, our loafers are, without hardly an exception, of either American, Irish or German parentage. Very often respectable and well to do parents have the misfortune of seeing turn one of their once promising sons into a forlorn loafer; and, what is still more painful, into one of the most reckless and cruel kind, because he boasts of a home, of money, friends and protectors. With a police organization having a higher aim than the prosecution and arrest of the most harmless of real or constructive offenders, the terrible American loafer would soon cease to exist; with a police organization conducted by keener intellects and loftier minds than those of ill-tempered and vindictive Mr. Kennedy and coarse and vulgar Mr. Acton, the loafer of New York city would soon become an impossibility. Lamented, murdered Scherr, the young butcher and good son above alluded to, would live to-day, a bright example, though an humble member of society, of dutiness and social virtue, if the police organization of the city of New York were a little more than a brute force of muscle, trained and drilled for extraneous and minor purposes, rather than the more essential, moral and material objects and interests of a great community. Had there been a lager-beer shop in the neighborhood of the corner of Eighteenth street and First avenue, into which some thirsty souls would have stolen on some Sunday afternoon, Mr. Kennedy's man would surely have detected it and filled up the station-house with one or more of the delinquents; but he did not notice the for-weeks-continued and daily-increasing intrusion, insolence and threats of a set of loafers in front of the butcher-shop and inside of it, nor did he mind it when made aware of and appealed to. To this man of Kennedy it amounted to very little, that weeks before the murder, committed under his very nose, one young Kelly seized one of the knives of the good butcher, who could have crushed the serpent between his fists, brandishing it before his eyes, and exclaiming "I have a notion to run it into you!" or using similar words. Well, the loafer made good his threats some weeks later; he run the knife into the stout and healthy body of the butcher, sending his dove-like, innocent soul to its creator, and to a far off, hopeful, old couple the crushing news of the untimely, cruel end of their good son. Mr. Kennedy's man was close by; but, alas! he came a few minutes too late, and could do nothing but receive the last gasp of the dying butcher, while the murderer made haste to reach the home of his wealthy parents in Sixteenth street, to put money in his pocket and to make off for parts unknown, not being arrested to this very day, or at least not when I left New York city. There are many in New York, more particularly acquainted with the facts and circumstances appertaining to this murder, who charge it to the account of the police, and I am one of these. Sir, it has become my lot to be a daily and constant observer and interpreter of events and recorder of facts, and I assure you, that in this, my capacity, I would be able to heap upon this lauded metropolitan police such an overwhelming array of facts, dating, too, no further back than the commencement of this present year, and all going to testify its incapacity, short-comings and delinquencies, that your sense of justice would revolt at the thought of being asked to force such an inefficient and costly system much longer on an unwilling community. But I cannot at present continue my narration of occurrences of quite recent dates, as I have to follow my excellent friend from the city, and my eloquent friend from Richmond, back to the year of 1863, to the great riot. I should have refrained from alluding to, or speaking of this bloody, terrible catastrophe, at once so injurious to the good reputation of the city of New York, and so humiliating to those in authority at the time, but for the persistent endeavor to palm off this riot to the uninitiated as a trump card in favor of the metropolitan police, its valor, efficiency and commendable appointments. And in order to show that my remarks are not to be taken in any partial or partisan light, I ask leave to call the attention of this honorable body to the fact that, in 1863 the board of commissioners of the metropolitan police was, to my knowledge, equally divided between the two parties.

Mr. HUTCHINS—The gentleman is evidently in error in that statement. The board was not equally divided in 1863. The law was passed in 1864, dividing it equally, and— .

Mr. GROSS—Then I am mistaken.

Mr. HUTCHINS—The republicans are chargeable with all the blame for what occurred at the time.

Mr. GROSS—If any of the gentlemen dwelling on this riot would have given us his own observations, or even quoted from the notes of reporters taken at the time of its occurrence, I should have received what was so stated with all due respect and deference; but to be wanted to listen in this regard to that most bare-faced piece of self-praising, white-washing effrontery as presented in the report of the police commissioners, and read on this floor, is more than I can silently submit to. Before proceeding with a narration of facts and events, all of which having come under my own personal observation, I must state that only in its very earliest stages this great riot has had a somewhat political aspect or character owing to the popular indignation excited by the unfair drafting in the city of New York—now no longer a disputed point—but that all the subsequent phases of this dark catastrophe, were nothing but a revelry or carnival of the very dregs of the metropolis. When on the morning of the 12th of July, 1863, (I guess I am correct in the date) news was brought to my house (gentlemen have heard me state that I live amongst the poor people and laboring classes) that the workingmen in the great foundries and machine shops—the Morgan works, the Novelty works, and other large establishments along the East river, then and there engaged in the manufacture of iron-clads and other war material for the federal government—had left their work in order to join in an attack on the draft stations, I knew that we had to prepare for the occurrence of most serious events, for the popular ire on the subject of the draft had risen to its fever heat and become almost uncontrollable; and I knew, too, that the workingmen in question were neither rebels themselves nor rebel sympathizers. In spite of the protestations of some one having an interest in the preservation of my limbs and life, I got it into my head to become an eye witness —or reporter, if you please—of what might come to pass. Having dispatched some necessary business at my office, I hastened up town, being joined by a courageous young friend, a disciple of the goddess of justice, and well known to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins]. The running of cars having ceased already, we had to walk on foot, and had not proceeded far beyond Union Square, when we heard that a terrible riot was already raging up town, that several drafting places and station-houses had been fired, that the police force had been beaten back, Superintendent Kennedy nearly killed, and so on. While wending my way up town, through crowds of people who had left their houses and were occupying the sidewalks and the middle of the streets, I noticed a large number of workingmen making their way back to the lower parts of the city. Most of these men were armed with clubs, iron bars, shot guns, and other weapons, satisfying me that in them I had before me the draft rioters proper, who, having carried out their single object were returning to their work or to their homes. From Twenty-third street up the city was totally in the possession of the mob. In the neighborhood of the street just mentioned, I beheld the last of the blue coats. Passing thus from First avenue to Second and Third avenues, I reached Forty-eighth street to find myself in the very center of conflagration and riot. A crazy Virginian, the same one who has had to serve as an emissary of rebeldom and leader of the mob, was just holding forth from the roof of a cattle-shed to a motley crowd of all kinds of people, good as well as bad, innocent as well as guilty ones. Passing through this scene of fire and excitement, I reached Fifth avenue, stationing myself, with my companion, against the railing of the negro orphan asylum. To my right, near Forty-fourth or Forty-fifth street, some firemen were seen halting with their apparatus, without making an attempt to reach the seat of the conflagration or to save even the little wooden shanty right in their front, which had just been fired by some urchins, led on by a single grown-up loafer, who probably desired to be avenged on the poor grog-shop keeper for giving him no trust. [Laughter.] At that moment they were standing on the roof of a rickety awning in front of the building, knocking in the windows in order to make the fire burn quicker. As soon as the flames burst forth from the windows, the boys and their leader jumped to the ground and looked on for a moment, when all at once the long-coated, short-built and insignificant loafer gave, with a piece of wood as his formidable weapon, the signal for an attack on the asylum. Myself and friend, shamed and mortified at such a spectacle, had to move on to make room for the assaulting incendiaries, at that moment scarcely a match for half a dozen valiant policemen. But there were none near or far, and in less than an hour's time the asylum was ransacked and burnt to the ground. Moving down Fifth avenue, where every thing was quiet, I reached Seventh avenue and Thirty-fourth street. This avenue, in which an arsenal is located that was in danger of being attacked by the mob, had been given in charge of my German friend, Colonel Louis Schirmer, then in the city on recruiting business for the Fifteenth heavy artillery. Explaining to the surrounding mob in his broken but forcible English, what it would amount to if they forced him to let his howitzers open their mouths, he had no difficulty to hold the street and protect the public property with a small number of his men, till the arrival of the military. When reaching Twenty-eighth street and Broadway, a large corner house used as a draft station was found enveloped in one sheet of flame, and surrounded by a numerous mob. A squadron of dragoons, mostly Germans, again, were just riding up to clear the streets, which they did without difficulty. But no policeman to be seen near or far again. Thus matters stood till I reached the neighborhood of Fifth avenue and Twenty-fifth street, Union square and Broadway, etc., when my eye met the blue coats once more, and in particular a very strong body of them in the neighborhood of the residence of our respected associate, the then mayor of the city of New York, who had been threatened by an unreasonable mob, though having done harm to no man. Sir, I did not rise for the purpose of denying moral or physical courage to Mr. Kennedy and his men. I know that they behaved like brave men, that they exposed their lives for the sake of the security and protection of the citizens and their property—that many of them got wounded and some killed in the affray. But, sir, I did rise for the purpose of impeaching the system, the character, and the discipline of this metropolitan police; I did rise for the purpose of stating here on this floor that, notwithstanding the self-sacrifice and courage of individual members of the police force, it was owing to its general inefficiency, springing chiefly from its unpopularity, that after the draft riot proper being over, the scum and dregs of the population, all the thieves, robbers, burglars, incendiaries, murderers and loafers among it and leading it, could, for the two subsequent days, become perfect masters of a large portion of the city, and enact unheard-of atrocities and outrages. Sir, I have seen all this with my own eyes; I have witnessed partially or wholly the perpetration of deeds, the recollection of which makes me shudder now; I have noticed hyenas in women's garb, and monsters in the shape of men, and I could not help trembling with terror at one time, and shaking with indignation at another, for it stood clearly before my mind all the time that it would have needed a popular and trusted police force only, with its proper chief, the mayor of the city, at its head, and legions of courageous and willing citizens at his disposition, to crush to atoms a tenfold more formidable mob than the one I beheld during the 12th, 13th and 14th of July, 1863, holding at bay and totally enervating and demoralizing the police until brought down and subdued by the balls, grape and canister of the military. Sir, what is the character and the standing of this metropolitan police? What is the cause of its proving like a straw in the stream during a trying emergency? It is its estrangement from the citizens; it is the lack of confidence in it on the part of the people, and the want of regard for persons and rights on the part of the police. This metropolitan police has become a foreign body, an inimical institution in the eyes of the New Yorkers, hated heartily, dreaded all the time, and tolerated in the hope only of a more or less speedy and thorough change. The discipline of this police is most unfortunate; its temper, disposition and bad humor would not be tolerated for a day in a monarchial city like London, Paris, Berlin or Vienna; it is an enigma that it has been suffered thus far in a free and self-governing community like New York. Clubbing and knock-downs are the order of the day, and shooting is no longer an exceptional or rare occurrence. No man, whatever be his station in public life or society, dare to correct, or to expostulate with a mistaken, indiscreet or unnecessarily brutal patrolman without being, if not personally known to the latter, in imminent danger of being knocked down at once. In fact, a New York policeman, thanks to the system, discipline and routine of Messrs. Acton and Kennedy, is no longer looked at as a protector and friend, but as an enemy by hundreds of thousands of law-abiding and order-loving people. We desire and do want a strong and vigilant and effective police, but we do not want to have it transformed into a task-master, spy, tyrant or brute. Of all kinds of despotism and brutalism that of a misdirected police is the most intolerable. Sir, let the wishes of my honored but mistaken friends, who have taken up the defense and laudation of this police, be granted by this body, and I venture to predict that the revised Constitution will not receive twenty-five thousand out of one hundred and fifty thousand votes in the cities of New York and Brooklyn. It is not the question whether we shall keep a board of police commissioners or have something else in its place; but it is the question whether that institution shall be the creation of State authority and partyism, shall stand in the character and exercise the functions of a hostile garrison, or whether it shall be regarded as the trustworthy guardian of public and private property and as the cherished and beloved friend and protector of every individual citizen who obeys the law. Such a police would be a blessing in a city like New York. The present one is partially a curse, partially a persiflage on what it ought to be. A great many other things have been said and assertions advanced by the honorable gentlemen from New York [Mr. Hutchins] and from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], to which I might reply; but having engaged the attention of this Convention, and challenged the kind indulgence of much abler debaters of the pending question for a sufficient length of time, I shall resume my seat for the present.

Mr. FRANCIS—Deferring to the views of others with whom I agree in the main, and consulting also my own convictions of duty after listening to arguments on the subject, I shall forego my intention of offering the sections of the present Constitution in reference to the government of cities, as a substitute for the report of the chairman of the committee [Mr. Harris], and shall support the proposed substitute offered by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], namely, the first section of the article proposed by Mr. Murphy in his minority report. As other sections are presented affecting the vital questions at issue, I trust that this Convention will assert distinctly the principle of State sovereignty as opposed to the proposition of erecting and constitutionalizing petty states or principalities, with independent and dangerous powers, within the body of our commonwealth. We want no divided sovereignty, parceled out to localities, to invite sectional strife and possible bloody collision, as in the case of the late rebellion, wherein the same doctrine of divided sovereignty was sought to be enforced by a terrible war, whose calamities are still deeply felt by a suffering country, and by thousands of stricken and bereaved households. Let us here and now assert the sovereignty of the whole State over its whole territory for the protection of all its citizens, and to secure the ends of good government, local as well as general.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I move that this Convention do now take its usual recess. It is within two or three minutes of the hour.

There being no objection,

The Convention took a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven P. M.

Mr. AXTELL—I move that the Convention take a recess for fifteen minutes.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Oh, no.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND — Occupy the time by making a speech. [Laughter.]

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared lost.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I hope the Convention will adopt the amendment moved by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]. I find by examining the first section as reported by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] in his minority report, that his section avoids the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham], a difficulty that is patent upon an examination of the first section of the report of the majority of the committee, and a difficulty which I think cannot but strike the mind of every gentleman upon looking at the section itself. The first section, as reported by the majority of the committee, commences in this wise, "The chief executive power in cities shall be vested in a mayor." Now, certainly this language covers the entire territory included within the bounds of a city, and it speaks of an executive power which may be energized within that territory, and it provides that the chief power which may be energized within that territory shall be vested in a mayor. The section as reported by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], avoids that difficulty, and it is drawn as I think any one would draw it, if he did not mean to have the difficulty which is patent upon the face of the section, as reported by the majority of the committee, corrected. It is in these words: "There shall be chosen every two years by the electors at large of every city a mayor who shall be the chief executive officer thereof." No difficulty is created by that. Precisely what the mayor is designed for is prescribed and defined, and the mayor is not made superior to the Executive of the State, is not made superior to every other power, but is made precisely what any gentleman, if he undertook to draw an article of this kind, as it seems to me, would desire to make him, the chief executive officer merely in the city, and not superior within that territory to every other power. Now, to be satisfied that the suggestion of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham]—for it is not mine—is not a fanciful one, let us look at the matter. "The chief executive power in cities shall be vested in a mayor." An exigency arises in which the Governor of the State brings, with the power of the entire four millions of the people of this State, comes to the city and claims to exercise his superior authority over that of the mayor. The mayor of the city meets him with the very Constitution under which they both hold their places, and which says that it shall be the duty of the Governor to see that the laws are executed throughout the whole State. "But," says the mayor, "when you come to this city, when you come within my limits, when you come within my jurisdiction, the Constitution of the State of New York makes me the chief executive officer of this city, and I am the chief executive officer here." For myself, I avow that my sentiments have not changed. I would not legislate upon this subject in the Constitution of the State; but if it be desired to prescribe in the Constitution how these things shall be, as I am very much inclined to believe that the Convention intends to do, it seems to me that the first section of the report of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] is unobjectionable in many of its aspects. In this respect I believe that the minority report made by Mr. Opdyke and the other gentlemen that concurred with him in that report, is equally unobjectionable. It does not give the chief executive power in the city to the mayor but it makes the mayor the chief executive officer in the city, and in that respect I consider it equally unobjectionable with that of Mr. Murphy.

Mr. LAPHAM—I would call the attention of the gentleman from Rensselaer to the first clause of the first section of the minority report [Document 138], in which I think the same objectionable language is contained.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The word "chief" is not used in that report, and it is the use of that word that makes the difficulty in the majority report. The objection is not that the mayor should have executive power in his city. The objection to the majority report is that it would make him the chief, paramount and above every other power. Although I prefer the language of the report made by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] to the minority report submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke]; still the latter is not open to the objection that it makes the mayor of the city within the city superior to every other power in the State.

Mr. OPDYKE—At the request of some friends who favor the more material portions of the article reported by my associates and myself, and inasmuch as I see no objection to the first section reported by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], I beg leave to withdraw for the present the substitute that I have offered.

The substitute of Mr. Opdyke having been withdrawn, the question recurred on the substitute of Mr. Curtis.

Mr HARRIS—I think the remarks of the gentleman from Rensselaer require a moment's consideration. He takes the position taken by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] last night, making the objection that the provisions of the first section of the majority report would create a conflict of jurisdiction. I am a little surprised that a good lawyer should argue that any such result would follow. The Constitution of the United States declares that the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States. The Constitution of this State declares that the executive power shall be vested in the Governor. Now, sir, no one has ever supposed that there was any conflict of authority or jurisdiction in consequence of the same phraseology being used in the two Constitutions. They are to be construed in pari materia. They are to be construed in reference to their subject-matter. The Constitution is to be construed in this respect in reference to the general powers conferred upon the President. The meaning of the provision is, as every lawyer knows, that the executive power in relation to the laws of the United States, shall be vested in the President of the United States. The meaning of the provision in the Constitution of the State of New York is, that the executive power in relation to the laws of the State of New York, shall be vested in the Governor. In this section of this article under consideration it is provided that the executive power in cities shall be vested in the mayor. That same provision is in the charter of New York and no one has encountered or apprehended any difficulty from it. "The executive power in the corporation of New York shall be vested in the mayor and the executive department," is the language of the present charter of the city of New York. Now, sir, the object in putting the word "chief" in this section, was to avoid the phrase "executive department," and to make the mayor the head of the executive power in New York; but if any gentleman thinks that any difficulty will arise from the use of the word "chief" I shall not be tenacious in retaining it. I do not think it amounts to any thing. I do not think it is of any very great consequence whether it be retained or not. If we were to say that the executive power in the city of New York, or in cities, should be vested in the mayor I should be quite satisfied. This provision is substantially the one that has always existed in the charter of the city of New York, and what I apprehend will be found in all charters; and it has no more effect in the Constitution than in a constitutional law. I apprehend, therefore, that there can be no difficulty about it. While I am on the floor I desire to say that I hope that those gentlemen in the Convention who are not disposed to give this subject the go-by, who are desirous of making an article that shall be acceptable to the people and that shall avoid the great evils to which reference has so often been made in this discussion, will reject these amendments proposed by gentlemen who are unfriendly to the article, and that they will unite together and perfect an article that shall be acceptable. I apprehend that that is the only way that we shall accomplish any thing. The proposition now to be voted on is one that is calculated to divide the friends of the article, and I hope that they will be willing to vote it down, and then that they will go on and perfect the sections one after another as they shall come up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT—The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]. The Secretary will read the section.

The SECRETARY read the section as follows:

"SEC. —. There shall be chosen every two years by the electors at large of every city, a mayor, who shall be the chief executive officer thereof, and whose duty it shall also be to see that the duties of the various city officers are faithfully performed. He shall have power to investigate their acts, to have access to all books and documents in their respective offices, and to examine their subordinates on oath. He shall also have power to suspend or remove such officers from office, whether they be elected or appointed, for violation or neglect of duty, to be specified in the order of suspension or removal; but no such removal shall be made without reasonable notice to the party complained of, and an opportunity afforded him to be heard in his defense."

The question was put on the substitute of Mr. Curtis, and, on a division, it was declared adopted, ayes 60, noes 24.

The SECRETARY read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. Any mayor may be removed by the Governor, but only after due notice and an opportunity of being heard in defense, and for causes to be assigned in the order of removal. In case the office of any mayor shall become vacant before the expiration of the term for which he was elected, the powers and duties of the office shall devolve upon the presiding officer of the board of aldermen until the vacancy shall be filled.

Mr. CURTIS—If there are no amendments to be proposed to this section, I shall offer a substitute for it.

The PRESIDENT—There being no amendments offered, the substitute of the gentleman from Richmond will be received.

Mr. CURTIS—I will read it for the information of the Convention. It is the second section slightly changed of the article reported by Mr. Murphy.

SEC. —. There shall be chosen every three years by the electors at large of every city, a comptroller, who shall have charge of the departments of finance. There shall be such other city officers as the Legislature shall provide; but for this purpose cities may be classified according to population and different officers provided for the different classes. All city officers for whose election or appointment no provision is made by existing laws or in this article, shall be elected by the voters of the city at large or of some division thereof, or appointed by the mayor, with the consent of the board of aldermen, as shall be provided by law. No city officer shall, during his term of office, hold a seat in the common council of the city, or in the Legislature of the State, and the acceptance of such a seat shall vacate his office.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I suggest that we pass over the sections until we arrive at the tenth, which covers the matter we have for several days discussed, for the purpose of taking a vote on that. All the other sections depend very much upon what we shall do with the tenth section. If that is adopted or rejected, we know precisely what to do with the other sections. I therefore move to proceed and consider the tenth section, passing by the others for the present.

The PRESIDENT—The motion is not strictly in order at this time, when there is an amendment pending, but if there is no objection it will be entertained.

Mr. HITCHCOCK—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection is made, and the motion cannot be entertained at this time.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I offer an amendment to the substitute which will reach the object which the gentleman has in view. I move to insert in the twelfth line of the substitute, after the word "law," the words "no civil division of the State other than counties, towns, cities and villages shall be created." That amendment being accepted I will support this substitute.

Mr. CURTIS—My intention was, when we should reach that point in the article to offer a substitute that would cover the whole ground.

Mr. RUMSEY—I desire to inquire whether if this substitute be adopted, it can be amended afterward?

The PRESIDENT—It can.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I had occasion once to express my views upon the principle involved in that amendment. I showed, as I thought, to the Convention, that this entire system of commissions depended upon a legislative creation of new political and civil divisions in the State. The Constitution of 1846, as we all know, prohibits in the most exact anguage, the appointment of county, town and city officers by any other authority than the electors of those localities. They must either be elected or appointed by the local authorities. That is precisely the Constitution under which we now live. These commissions, about which so much has been said, have been created under a legislative device creating political or civil divisions other than those I have named. Without that legislative creation of new divisions, the officers who now fill these various commissions, would be city officers, their functions being identical with those which had been previously discharged by the officers of the cities. The court of appeals held that a new name did not create a new office; and, therefore, that the whole question of the validity of the laws creating these commissions depended, upon the creation of new political divisions of the State. My amendment is intended to reach that precise question, and upon that amendment I call for the ayes and noes.

Mr. GOULD—I would like to ask the gentleman from Onondaga a question; whether school-districts are not civil divisions of the State?

Mr. COMSTOCK—No, sir; they are not. They have nothing to do with the government of the State. They are merely educational divisions.

Mr. CURTIS—I wish to say that in due order I shall offer a substitute which will cover the ground sought now to be covered by the gentleman from Onondaga, [Mr. Comstock] whose amendment, therefore, I trust will be voted down. The substitute which I shall offer, will come in more properly, as it seems to me, as a distinct section.

Mr. McDONALD—I would like to ask the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] a question; whether the substitute would not constitutionalize all the commissions now existing?

Mr. CURTIS—The substitute which I shall offer?

Mr. McDONALD—I understand the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] to accept this substitute which says, "all officers provided by law."

Mr. CURTIS—This refers only to city officers.

Mr. DUGANNE—I wish to ask the gentleman from Onondaga whether his amendment would not destroy the present judicial and senatorial districts of the State?

Mr. COMSTOCK—Not at all, sir.

Mr. DUGANNE—Why not?

Mr. COMSTOCK—That is all provided for in the Constitution.

Mr. MURPHY—I came in as this motion was about to be put, and I do not understand what is the motion before the house, except as to the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. The original proposition I do not understand.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I will slightly change the phraseology of my amendment, so that it will read: "No political or civil division other than those mentioned in this Constitution shall be created."

Mr. E. BROOKS—I suppose that upon the issue of this amendment depends the disposition to be made of the report of the majority of the committee, and the report of the minority in charge of Mr. Opdyke, one of the members of the Committee on Cities. I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] will be approved. Unless it is adopted, it seems to me, we are to return to the same order of things which has led to so much discussion in this Convention and so much discussion in the Legislature and in the State at large. I have not availed myself of the opportunity to reply to the many remarks which have been made by gentlemen during this discussion in reference to the question of commissions, and to my agency in originating one of them; but having been assailed, directly or indirectly, by every gentleman except one who has taken part in discussing the majority report of this committee, and for my direct agency in the creation of the police commission for the city of New York—having been alluded to over and over again, in reference to the part I took in the Senate of the State some ten years since, I deem it but justice to myself, justice to the democratic members of that Legislature and to this Convention, to state precisely what were the facts. I shall not reiterate what I said last week, which was literally true, as to the origin of the police bill, nor to the great feeling in the city of New York in reference to its passage, nor to the general demand on the part of the people in that city for a change in the police department. But, sir, at that time I was not a member of the democratic party. I owed nothing to it, for nearly every member of it, I believe, voted against me, and it owed nothing to me, and on that score we were precisely equal. As little did I owe to the members of the republican party, for they unanimously, I believe, were in opposition to me then as those with whom I acted were in opposition to them. But it so happened that I was chairman of the Committee on Cities in the Senate of the State, and that this law having passed the Assembly by a large majority (not one member of the democratic party, however, voted for it there) came to the Senate and was placed in my hands. In the Senate it went through the ordinary forms of legislation, not, however, receiving the discussion which was due to a measure of such importance, for it was not introduced until the fourth of April, 1857, and it was passed on the fifteenth of the same month. It received some twenty-seven affirmative votes, and there were but five votes against it. The five gentlemen who voted against it were, with a single exception, members of the democratic party, including Mr. Sickles, at that time a prominent member of the democratic party, Mr. Spencer of New York, Mr. Kelly of Columbia, and two others. I desire to say in justice to those who constitute the minority in this Convention, and with whom I am now acting, that neither in the Assembly nor in the Senate did a single member of the democratic party give his vote for the police bill of 1857. There was a remonstance against it from the Brooklyn common council and from the common council of New York city. But let me also add, Mr. President, in justice to myself, and in justice to the police bill of 1857 and to the act of 1867, that the one bears no more resemblance to the other than light and darkness bear to each other. The police bill which I introduced and defended in the Senate of the State made provision that the mayor of the city of New York, a democrat, and the mayor of the city of Brooklyn, a democrat, should be members ex officio of the police board, and should have all the powers of those who were appointed by the Governor; and in regard to the other members of the commission, let me say that before I gave my support, sanction or vote to that measure, that I had an assurance from the friends of the Governor of the State that the members of the commission should be selected irrespective and independent of political considerations. I went to the Governor myself, and implored him that of the commissioners to be appointed, and first named in the bill, one should be selected from each of the then prevailing parties in the State of New York—one from the American party, one from the democratic party, and one from the republican party—

Mr. HUTCHINS—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—Does the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E Brooks] yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins]?

Mr. E. BROOKS—I do, sir.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I desire to ask the gentleman from Richmond how, if that was the case, it happened that the commission consisted of five members besides the mayor?

Mr. E. BROOKS—I had the assurance of the friends of the Governor that the commissioners should be apportioned among the three prominent parties in the State. When the bill was introduced the number of commissioners provided for was three. When it was passed it was five. I am not incorrect, I think, either in my facts or my conclusions; and if the gentleman from New York had given me the opportunity to state without interruption, all the facts, I should have stated this also.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I will say to the gentleman from Richmond, as my justification for interrupting him, that he stated that after the bill had passed he went to the Governor and implored him to appoint one of the commissioners from each of those three parties.

Mr. E. BROOKS—The gentleman is very eager to catch mistakes and make interruptions, but if he had listened to my remarks he would have heard a full statement of the whole matter.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Let me say, Mr. President, in addition, and as having an important bearing upon this subject, that the details of the police bill of 1857 and those of the existing police act, are entirely unlike. The supervisors of the county of Kings and the supervisors of the county of New York had the selection of the patrolmen under the police bill of 1857. Every man to be appointed was to be selected by the local authorities, the supervisors, under a special amendment inserted at the time in the act itself. The supervisors of the county of Kings and of the county of New York had the selection of the men and the regulation of their pay; and as every gentleman knows, that provision was entirely unlike the present system. The appointment of these officers was a local matter, a local power, a local patronage, if you please, entirely independent of State authority except so far as the State, the Governor by and with the advice and consent of the Senate had the naming of the five commissioners who formed the majority of the commission. Sir, I trust that after this explanation gentlemen will see and recognize a wide difference between the police commission under the act of 1857, and the police commission under the present law. Now, sir, in regard to commissions generally, I also desire to say that I have no objection to a commission as a commission. I hold that there may be commissions appointed by the State which may properly exercise authority in certain localities; but when commissions of this kind are named by the State, they should be for some specific purpose, and exercise their authority for some limited time. I also understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hutchins] alluded to my agency in the matter of the harbor commission. Well, sir, I did take a prominent part in the passage of that act. It was a commission made up partly by the federal government, and partly by the State government, and it was created for federal and State purposes. It was a commercial commission purely, and its object was to prevent encroachment upon the harbor of New York by the extension of piers in the North and East rivers, and to prevent obstructions in the lower portions of the harbor. It was eminently a proper subject for the State and for the United States government to consider, and when that commission had closed its labors it surrendered its powers to the source from which they were originally obtained, and there was an end of it. All such commissions, commercial in their character, are proper. In regard to other commissions, if they have to do with a subject in which the State is mainly interested, and in which the locality has not the prior interest and right, why, then the State may manifest its interest by creating such a commission. Limited commissions for limited services, and for limited times, are eminently wise; but not a commission to administer local government for all time, the expense of which is imposed upon the people, as in the case of this police commission for the city of New York. I shall not occupy much more of the time of this Convention, but I wish to say a few words in vindication of myself in regard to one or two other matters which have come up in this debate. Let me say first that I am opposed to the report of my friend Mr. Opdyke, and that I am opposed to the report of my friend from Kings [Mr. Murphy], unless the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] shall be adopted, and then, in justice to the majority of the committee to which I belong and to which the gentlemen also belong, I must say that I prefer the majority report to either the report of the gentleman from Kings, or the report of the gentleman from New York My main objection to the report of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] is that, unless amended as proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga, it gives the Legislature nearly all the power which it now possesses, and that under this section, commissions may be created hereafter as they have been created in the past.

Mr. MURPHY—Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. E. BROOKS—Certainly.

Mr. MURPHY—It is due to myself Mr. President, that I should remark here that the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] has entirely misinterpreted my report. Certainly he could not have read it with his usual attention, or he would not have made the remark that he has just expressed, that the effect of it would be to continue commissions. My report expressly states that in the main I agree with the majority of the committee and that I differ from them merely in the points stated. But as the points stated have no reference to commissions it cannot be, therefore, that I differ from the majority on that subject.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I am not dealing with the report of the gentleman from Kings. I am dealing with the article reported by him, and here let me read it to see whether or not I am just in my construction of its meaning.

Mr. MURPHY—The gentleman must read my report in connection with the article, or he will not understand the article, for except as to two sections, I agree with the majority report in all other respects.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Well, if I am mistaken, I am very happy to be corrected, and to make my apology to the gentleman. I only say now, that this second section which is under consideration, is capable, without the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], of being so construed as to allow the Legislature to create commissions. If the section were left without amendment there can be no doubt that under it the Legislature would have power to create such commissions as they might think proper. It says, for example, "There shall be such other officers in cities as the Legislature shall provide;" and again it says, 'all officers—"

Mr. CURTIS—Will my colleague give way for a moment?

Mr. E. BROOKS—I will, sir.

Mr. CURTIS—The substitute reads, "all city officers."

Mr. E. BROOKS—Well, sir, I am dealing with the original amended article itself, in justification of the remark that I made, and my impression was that the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] meant to make an independent article in the two sections; but, as I have said, I am very glad to be corrected, if I am mistaken. Let me come, now, to the report of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyde] who is an ex-mayor of that city, who has taken a deep interest in this subject, and who has two members of the committee associated with him in the recommendation of his report. My objections to his report, and which I understand he will press by and by upon the Convention, are, I may say, sevenfold; and I will state them very briefly. In the first place, his report gives the power to the Governor to remove the mayor, and gives it in a way unlike the practice which has been common in the State, and in a way to which I have most serious objections. His report also ignores the wards of the city. It gives no ward representation. The gentleman from New York knows that there are a large number of wards in New York; but he chooses to disown their existence, as the Legislature has since the adoption of the existing charter. Now, if these wards are to exist, they ought to be recognized as wards, and not as districts like the councilmanic districts at present existing in the city, and which make confusion worse confounded in the selection and election of candidates, by making division lines over and through streets without recognizing the existence of the ward boundaries. His article gives the local legislature power, but makes a division of the power which does not locally recognize the people themselves. For example, he recognizes the power of the people to elect eleven aldermen to constitute the upper branch of the local legislature, but the members of the other branch are to be selected from a class of tax payers, every one of whom must own property equal in value to one thousand dollars. Again, Mr. President, this report insists that the comptroller of the city, the money power of the city, shall be elected by the tax payers, as the upper branch of the local legislature is to be elected. Sir, I am against all such distinctions. I do not recognize in a government like ours any distinction between one class of citizens and another class of citizens—any distinction on the score of citizenship between wealth and poverty. It is misfortune enough for a man to be poor, without having the ban of a Constitutional Convention and of a State Legislature put upon his poverty. I maintain, Mr. President, that this distinction between tax payers who have property and those who unfortunately have no property upon which the State can rest its eyes or lay its hands, is a theory wholly uncongenial

to our government; and I maintain also that no such distinction can properly exist under a government like ours. Here is a poor man who lives in one of the tenement houses in the city of New York, and there are between eighteen and nineteen thousand of such houses in that city. The rich landlord, powerful in money and influence, will sub-let his tenement houses in a way to secure twenty or thirty per cent on the capital, and in a way which the second party can make ten or fifteen per cent as his agent; and then the poor tenant, who is huddled with his family in one of the rooms of these houses, is taxed to pay this thirty, forty, or more per cent. Do you tell me, sir, that this tenant is not a tax payer? Is he not as much a tax payer, according to his means, as the gentleman who owns the house itself, and who secures this high percentage upon the capital which he has invested in it? It is the avarice of the landlord that leads him to do this, and you are putting a premium upon his avarice by giving such a man the right to vote for a comptroller and for a board of aldermen when you deny the same right to the poor man who is his tenant. Sir, I maintain that every man who consumes food, wears clothes, who breathes the air of heaven, who occupies a tenement, who walks the streets seeking his daily labor, is in every way a citizen, discharging the duties of a citizen, and is, in every proper sense of the word, a tax payer. I think every fair man must see this. I now leave this branch of the subject and proceed to two or three other points which I wish to make before I resume my seat. And first, as connected with the subject which I have just been considering, I put it to the candor of this Convention, and of the gentlemen representing the rural districts of this State, to say if there can be any just distinction or discrimination between a man living on the island of Manhattan or in the city of Brooklyn, and a man living in the rural districts. In the rural parts of the State you vote for your sheriffs, for your local judges, for your justices of the peace, for your boards of supervisors for your county judge, for every officer whose duties belong to local affairs, and yet when it comes to the city of New York, you talk about society, and about expediency, and about the difference between a man living in one locality and a man living in another. I deny the justice of such distinctions, and I say that when you recognize the fact that there are about 1,800,000 men living in the cities of this State, which has, altogether, only about 4,000,000 of people, you cannot afford to put the ban of degradation upon this large class of your fellow men. They are your equals under the law, and your equals in the eye of the God of mercy and of justice; and, if equals, they are entitled to all the privileges and immunities which you are entitled to, wholly irrespective of the geographical locality in which they reside. And when it comes to the matter of choosing local officers to administer local affairs, they have their rights in their localities just as much as you have yours, and if you are fair and just men you will recognize this equality of right between yourselves and them. Now, sir, a word in regard to the assaults upon the city of New York which we have heard from time to time in this Convention for months past. We have heard a good deal about the foreign population, and that the people of that great city are not to be trusted because they are made up largely of men who are ignorant and vicious. Sir, it has been admitted by gentlemen of candor in this Convention that there is as much vice in the country in proportion to population as there is in the cities of the State. Vice is often more easily concealed in the country than it is in the city, and as I have had occasion to say when speaking of the institutions of the city of New York, there are a great many inmates of those institutions whose homes are in the country. People come from the country, fill our public institutions, fill our hospitals, fill those four hundred houses of abortion which Boston says exist among us, and which make up one of the disgraceful elements of life in the city of New York. I had occasion to say before, sir, in regard to the foundling hospital that the majority of the inmates of that institution are from the rural districts, and we know the counties they come from and the circumstances under which they came. Sir, are we in the city of New York to suffer because we are so located that people can go there and relieve themselves of the consequences of their vice? What said the gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand] the other night? He said that even our city charities, our munificent provision for the relief of the poor and the destitute, was an incident and a proof of the immorality of the city, and an argument in favor of its government by the State. Sir, let me give the gentleman what might be called an argumentum ad hominem. There is in the county of Broome an institution known as the inebriate asylum, and the city of New York paid from its excise fund last year $128,000 for the support of that asylum in the city of Binghamton. Because there are so many inebriates in that asylum shall I therefore say that that is an incident of the immorality of that locality? Sir, the argument is just as good in the one case as it is in the other, and it is not worth a rush in either case; but it nevertheless tells the whole truth in reference to a fact like this. Those institutions of charity are in the city of New York because there are a million of people there, and because nearly 250,000 emigrants arrive there every year. And, sir, the worst of these emigrants do not remain, as was said by my colleague from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] the other day, because, if the reports before us are true, a million of dollars has been expended within a few years past in the rural districts for the support of this very class of poor emigrants who have made their homes in the interior towns and counties of the State. My colleague said the other day that New York was the bete of the State. He did not say the bete noir, he did not add the latter word, I suppose, because of his respect for the color named, for I believe that the word noir means black.

Mr. CURTIS—If my colleague will allow me I will say that he misunderstood me. I said gate, not bete. [Laughter.]

Mr. E. BROOKS—Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. I understood him to say that the city of New York was the bete of the State, and it was so much in harmony with his general

Digitized by Google

reflections upon the character of the city of New York that it never occurred to me that I could be mistaken. I wondered, however, why he did not add the other word. But my other friend from Columbia [Mr. Gould] was pleased to speak of the city of New York as "the common sewer of the State." Why, sir, that was a most unjust reflection to come from him. He was pleased to say also, in regard to the large number of charities in that municipality, that they were the result of appropriations not mainly from the city of New York, but from the State of New Jersey, the State of Connecticut and elsewhere. Sir, it seems to be the pleasure, the delight, the joy of gentlemen of a certain class, in this Convention, to say all the evil things they can of the greatest municipality of the State and of the new world. New York is the pride of the nation and it ought to be the pride of the State; and yet in this State Constitutional Convention there seems to be, as I have said, a sincere joy on the part of some gentlemen in saying all manner of evil things against it, and to hold it up to the world in a way to disgrace it. Sir, I deny the gentleman's proposition. I maintain upon the record that the bulk of the charities of the city of New York are contributions in, of and from that city. I point, for example, to that splendid edifice built by Peter Cooper. Is he not a citizen of New York, locally and in every other respect? I point to the vast amount of money which Chauncey Rose appropriated for a local charity in that city. I point to the New York Astor Library, built and established in a contribution by father and son, amounting to half a million dollars. I point to the New York hospital, for which, in one single year, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars have been appropriated by the people of that city. I point to the Leake and Watt asylum. I point to the New York Historical society, built up entirely by appropriations of the people of that city; and, sir, I might go through all these various charities, and name millions of money which have been appropriated for objects of literature and art, and for objects of charity within a very few years, including, I believe, some seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, if not a million dollars, appropriated for the Women's Hospital, by Mr. Roosevelt, which will soon be erected. And, sir, I will go further and say, that, for the suffering poor of the South, irrespective of color, some hundred thousand dollars was appropriated during the last year, and since then thousands more for the sick and diseased at the South. I will say in regard to the war, which has been alluded to over and over again during this discussion, that New York city, in that war, through its banks and its citizens, contributed more men and more money in proportion than any other people in any part of the United States. And, sir, I may say in regard to the sanitary commission that the sum of two millions of dollars was appropriated there for the relief of the suffering soldiers in the hospitals of the country, who were prostrated and made helpless by scars, and by disease and wounds upon the fields of battle at the South. Sir, I admit there are dark pictures of the city of New York, but there are bright ones also, and while so many gentlemen around me seem to take sincere pleasure in involving the city in a cloud by which it would seem to be sunk as in Egyptian or Cimmerian darkness, I take pleasure, but most imperfectly, in the hurry of the moment, in relieving the city from the dark cloud which they have placed upon it. I desire to say one word only in regard to what was stated by my friend on my right [Mr. Stratton] and by other gentlemen in reference to the riots of 1863 and the riots of 1861. My friend was pleasod to say that he was one of the number who accidentally presented himself in front of the office of the New York Express, when a large crowd was there—a mob, I call it—a vicious, thieving mob, who presented themselves there in the holy name of loyalty and patriotism, demanding that the flag of the United States should be raised over that office. Sir, I respect the flag of my country as much as my friend [Mr. Stratton]. My own father gave his life in its defense There is not a star or a stripe upon it which I do not honor and love and respect, and I defy any man, anywhere, at any time, under any circumstances, to show that I have done aught to dishonor that flag or that I do not esteem it as highly as those who profess to honor it much more. But there are places where I do not like to see the American flag placed. I would never have it placed over a church, holy as the church of God may be, nor have it prostituted by being placed over a grog-shop or any other place of dishonor. Nothing of this kind can ever be charged upon me. When, in the early history of the rebellion in the city of Memphis, there were men misguided and wicked enough to dishonor the flag, and also in the State of South Carolina, to dig a grave for the American flag, and literally to bury it under their feet, I held that all these people degraded their manhood, and I held them also in contempt, as I always shall any man who any where calls that flag "a flaunting lie," or does any thing to dishonor the flag of the nation. There are times and places appropriate to all things; and when my friend [Mr. Stratton] said that he clapped his hands in the presence of that multitude as the flag went up, in obedience to the mob—though as a fact, by the request of the police—I could not but think he might have been found in a great deal better company than upon that occasion; and I am sure he never was found in any so bad, either before or since that time. Sir, in regard to mobs, and this mob spirit I had occasion the other night to specify some of these mobs in different parts of the State and country. Mr. President, I did not say all that I might have said. I did not allude to the mob in my own county of Richmond, when it was truly said that the State property was fired at night and the inmates of the hospital were turned out to lie upon the cold earth at night. Sir, when my colleague [Mr. Curtis] was pleased, albeit, upon my call, to say that the journal with which I was connected was one of those which had been instrumental in maintaining, or encouraging, or doing any thing to support the mob spirit or mob men, the words upon my lips were those of Saint Paul to Timothy: "Alexander, the coppersmith, has done me much evil. May the Lord reward him according to his works." I will not retaliate upon my friend from Richmond by asking whether or not he took a conspicuous part in those memorable riots on Staten Island. I know, as an opponent of that riot, that from one end of the south shore to the other, I was burned in effigy, because by my voice and in the press with which I was connected, I opposed it with all the vehemence and earnestness of which I was capable. No, Mr. President, I have never encouraged mobs. I abhor them. I would deal with them, after due warning, as summarily as powder and ball could deal with them. I detest a mob in every part and parcel and arrangement of it. Having said these few words in justification of myself, I leave the subject.

Mr. ARCHER—I move the previous question.

SEVERAL DELEGATES—No, no.

Mr. DEVELIN—I desire the ayes and noes on the vote.

Mr. ARCHER—At the request of the gentleman from Richmond, I withdraw the motion for the previous question.

Mr. CURTIS—I wish to say to the Convention that in case the pending amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], which seems to me to be out of place in this section, shall be voted down, I shall then propose as a substitute the tenth section of the minority report submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke], which I will read:

"SEC. 10. The State, for the purposes of local government, shall be divided into towns, counties, cities and villages, as heretofore, and no other local divisions or districts shall be made except for sanitary and police purposes. The right to provide for the preservation of the public health and to appoint and control the police force of the State shall remain with the State Legislature; and in the exercise of these rights the Legislature may adopt whatever territorial divisions or local districts it may deem most conducive to the public good."

It will be perceived that the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga can then be offered, prohibiting any further divisions, and then the question would be squarely raised in its proper place. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman will be voted down here as out of its place.

Mr. MURPHY—I suppose we have passed the domain of discussion of the general question. I shall not, therefore, follow my friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] in the manner of this discussion, but I cannot permit what he has said in regard to the report which I have submitted to pass without correction. The gentleman is in error in regard to the scope of that report in supposing that I differed from the views of the majority on the subject of local government. I beg to call his attention to its language, which he has overlooked. My report commences as follows:

"The undersigned, concurring with a majority of the committee in most of their recommendations, dissents from those which confer upon the mayors the sole power of appointing all the officers of cities, including the members of boards of administration, commonly called commissions, except the comptroller and one or two other officers."

Now, sir, there is a distinct declaration on my part that I concur with the majority of the committee except so far as they propose to confer the sole power upon the mayor of appointing city officers, and with another exception, and that is in regard to the time of holding municipal elections. I am not in favor of commissions filled by appointments at Albany, nor have I ever omitted to express my views in opposition to them; and a proper construction of my report shows that I favor the report of the majority in this respect.

Mr. DALY—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Would it not be possible, under the section he has reported, as it is proposed to be amended, to have commissions, provided they were limited to the city of New York or any other city so as to come under the denomination of city officers?

Mr. MURPHY—I was about to make a remark which will answer the inquiry of my friend from New York [Mr. Daly]. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] is simply that there should be no new division of the State other than those already recognized in the Constitution; namely, counties, cities, towns and villages. Now, as I understand it, that section has no reference to all commissions, but only to a certain class of commissions; namely such as may be appointed for districts. It has no reference whatever, to those commissions which are appointed for cities only. Nor is there any provision that I am aware of in the report of the majority of the committee on that point; and for aught that appears in the report of the majority or in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] commissioners may be appointed for the city of New York as heretofore, like the commissioners of Central Park. I dissent too from the idea of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], that this amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] will effect the repeal of all commissions. That amendment is prospective. It simply provides that hereafter, no districts other than acknowledged districts in this State shall be created, leaving in existence those that have already been created. In other words, it leaves the police and health commission as they now exist in full force. I shall, however, support the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga. It is good as far as it goes; but something more will be necessary in the direction I have mentioned—I mean in regard to the existing districts.

Mr. FOLGER—Is an amendment now in order?

The PRESIDENT—It is not.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell for the previous question, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by avote of 58 ayes to 24 noes.

The SECRETARY then proceeded to call the roll on the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock.

The name of Mr. Conger was called.

Mr. CONGER—I desire to be excused from voting, having paired with the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt].

The PRESIDENT—The arrangement will be recognized.

The name of Mr. Smith was called.

Mr. SMITH—I desire to be excused, having paired with Mr. Alvord, who is absent.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will be excused.

The name of Mr. E. Brooks was called.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I ask to be excused, having paired with Mr. C. E. Parker on this question.

The PRESIDENT—The arrangement will be recognized.

The SECRETARY concluded the calling of the roll and the amendment of Mr. Comstock was declared lost by the following vote.

Ayes—Messrs. Baker, Barto, Bergen, Cassidy, Chesebro, Colahan, Comstock, Cooke, Corning, Daly, Develin, Ferry, Garvin, Graves, Hadley, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hatch, Hiscock, Hitchman, Jarvis, Larremore, A. R. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Loew, Masten, Mattice, Monell, Murphy, Potter, Robertson, Rogers, Rolfe, Schumaker, S. Townsend, Tucker, Veeder, Verplanck, Wales, Weed, Wickham, Young—43.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Beals, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Cheritree, Corbett, Curtis, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Endress, Field, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Frank, Gould, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Kinney, Krum, Landon, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Lee, Mc Donald, Miller, Opdyke, Pond, President, Prindle, Prosser, Rathbun, Reynolds, Root, Rumsey, Seaver, Silvester, Strattqn, M. I. Townsend, Van Campen, Wakeman, Williams—57.

Mr. OPDYKE—I move as a substitute for the third section which has just been read, the third section of the minority report submitted by me. It will be seen that to make that harmonize with the section that has just been adopted, it will be necessary to provide that the substitute which I offer shall be the second section, and that the second section which we have adopted, shall be the third in the article. Then they will be in perfect harmony and be consistent with each other. Now, Mr. President, I have stated in the written report and on the floor of this Convention all I deem it necessary to say in support of that section. I prefer to hear what objections may be urged against it, and then I will ask the privilege of making a response to these objections.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I would ask for information whether the second section of the report of Mr. Murphy has been adopted as amended on the motion of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]?

The PRESIDENT—The substitute of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] was adopted in place of the second section.

The question was then put on the adoption of the substitute offered by Mr. Curtis, and it was declared adopted.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the third section as follows:

SEC. 3. Except in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, the legislative power shall be vested in a board of aldermen; their number, the mode of their election, and their term of service shall be prescribed by law. In New York and Brooklyn, the legislative power shall be vested in a common council composed of a board of aldermen and a board of assistant aldermen. The board of aldermen shall consist of twelve members, to be chosen by the electors of the city at large. They shall be classified so that three aldermen shall go out of office each year, and after the expiration of their several terms under such classification, the term of office shall be four years. The board of assistant aldermen shall consist of one member from each ward, and shall be elected annually.

Mr. DEVELIN — According to the remarks which have been made by members of this Convention, we are all in a general sense democrats. The democracy that has been exhibited here, and I apply this remark especially to the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] is that, the rights of the minority should be protected by taking away even the rights of the majority. Revolutions, Mr. President, never go backward. There was a time when property was needed as a representation for voting, but this has been changed, and I am utterly surprised that the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] should desire that property should be represented in the election of either aldermen, councilmen, mayor, or any other officer in the city of New York. So much obscurity has been thrown by the gentleman from Richmond, Mr. Curtis, upon my right, in reference to the riots of 1863, that it may be well to discuss the question of riots. I propose to say a word on that subject. I believe that Moses delivered the Israelites from Egypt by a riot or mob. [Laughter.] I believe that the revolutionary war was commenced by a mob in Boston, if I have read history aright. The tea would not have been thrown overboard from the vessel in Boston harbor had it not been by a mob or riot; and the county of Richmond would never have been delivered from what they considered a pestilence if the people had not been encouraged by the gentleman representing the county of Richmond on this floor—I do not mean you [Mr. E. Brooks], I mean the other gentleman. When that gentleman [Mr. Curtis] rose and showed his indignation at the riots of 1863, it was a grievous point for me to listen to him. I was, at the time of the burning of the quarantine hospitals on Staten Island in 1861, counsel of the commissioners of emigration, and when poor, sick foreigners with the small-pox and ship fever were taken from those burning hospitals and laid out upon the cold ground and died there without assistance—

Mr. CURTIS—Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I wish to ask how many died.

Mr. DEVELIN—Two, to my knowledge.

Mr. CURTIS—Did they die from exposure?

Mr. DEVELIN—Yes, sir, from exposure on a wet night. As Richard Busteed would say, "are you answered?" [Laughter.] Two, to my knowledge, who were taken out of this hospital on that night, died.

Mr. RATHBUN—I rise to a point of order. If this discussion is to go on, it should go on in order, and be confined to the question before the Convention. I have listened to the debate, and have heard but little upon the pending question.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken. The gentleman will confine his remarks to the substitute offered. A wide latitude was indulged in in Committee of the Whole, and debate must be restricted to parliamentary limits.

Mr. DEVELIN—I would like to ask the President a question. If this body is an assemblage of rioters, what objection there can be to discussing a riot? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman must confine himself to the question.

Mr. DEVELIN—If, after giving an opportunity to all the members upon the other side to discuss this question, I am to be shut off, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. LOEW—I call for the ayes and noes on the pending substitute.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll on the substitute of Mr. Opdyke.

The name of Mr. E. Brooks was called.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I suppose that I must regard myself as having paired on this question with the gentleman from Tioga [Mr. C. E. Parker].

The SECRETARY concluded the calling of the roll on the substitute offered by Mr. Opdyke, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Armstrong, Beals, Beckwith, E. P. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Clarke, Ely, Gould, Hale, Hand, Ketcham, Lapham, Lee, Opdyke, Pond, President, Prindle, Prosser, Reynolds, Silvester, Stratton—22.

Noes—Messrs. C. L. Allen, Archer, Axtell, Baker, Barto, Bell, Bergen, Bickford, E. A. Brown, Case, Cassidy, Cheritree, Chesebro, Colahan, Comstock, Cooke, Corbett, Corning, Curtis, Daly, Develin, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Endress, Ferry, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Frank, Garvin, Graves, Hadley, Hammond, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hatch, Hitchcock, Hitchman, Houston, Hutchins, Jarvis, Kinney, Krum, Landon, Larremore, A. Lawrence, A. R. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Loew, Masten, Mattice, McDonald, Miller, Monell, Murphy, A. J. Parker, Potter, Rathbun, Robertson, Rogers, Rolfe, Root, Rumsey, Schumaker, Seaver, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen, Veeder, Verplanck, Wakeman, Wales, Weed, Wickham, Williams, Young —78.

Mr. CURTIS—I offer now for the third section the tenth section of the article contained in the minority report of Mr. Opdyke.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the amendment as follows:

SEC. 10. The State, for the purposes of local government, shall be divided into towns, counties cities and villages, as heretofore, and no other local divisions or districts shall be made except for sanitary and police purposes. The right to provide for the preservation of the public health and to appoint and control the police force of the State shall remain with the State Legislature; and in the exercise of these rights the Legislature may adopt whatever territorial divisions or local districts it may deem most conducive to the public good.

Mr. DALY—Mr. President, after the adoption of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] by which the existing commissions and the present mode of appointing the commissions is impliedly recognized by the provision declaring that all city officers for whose election or appointment no provision is made in this article or by existing laws—

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DALY—I would rather not. I will be very brief in my remarks.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I was going to ask if police officers were city officers.

Mr. DALY—My answer to the gentleman will be included in what I rose to say. I say that, as a matter of construction, in which I possibly may be mistaken, but in which I agree with the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] and disagree with the framer of the amendment to the section of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], this section as amended does recognize all the existing commissions and the mode of appointment under them; and the modifications proposed in the amendment which the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] has offered being the tenth section of the minority report of Mr. Opdyke, is simply a territorial limitation of the power, except where it is exercised for sanitary or police purposes. It does not touch the mode of appointment. Under the existing section, the commissioners, as officers under existing laws and is not provided for in the Constitution, in which indeed the heads of the police department, are included, are excepted from the operation of the mode of appointment provided for in the section and a different mode of appointment as respects them is distinctly recognized. I call the attention of the Convention to this fact, that, the effect of the pending motion of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] may be distinctly understood, and the extent to which the tenth section qualifies the section which has been adopted.

Mr. DEVELIN—When I was called to order, a few moments ago, I was talking on the subject of mobs. I suppose, as the question of police is now under discussion, I can proceed in my allusion to mobs in order. I desire to disabuse the minds of the members of this Convention of representations which have been made in regard to the mob of 1863. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] was at that time mayor of the city of New York and I occupied at that time the position of corporation counsel. I think he and I understand the causes and the operations of that mob as well as any two men in this Convention. In the first place, the riot of 1863 was not created in the interest of the southern rebellion, or with any combination with southerners, or with any combination with General Lee or any body representing—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair must call the gentleman to order, and ask that he confine his remarks to the pending question.

Mr. DEVELIN—I am talking about the police. I was about to say that Mr. Kennedy—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman is not in order. His remarks are not germane to the pending question.

Mr. DEVELIN—The police of the city of New York, Mr. President, according to the representation of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], knew all about this riot.

Digitized by Google

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. DEVELIN—Is not the discussion of the question of police in order?

The PRESIDENT—The question of police, with reference to its action during the riots of 1863, is not germane to the question under discussion.

Mr. DEVELIN—The question, as I understand it, is, shall we give to the Legislature a territorial jurisdiction in respect to the organization of the police different from the divisions prescribed in the Constitution? As the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] has said, the amendment preserves the present commissions. Now I am not opposed to police commissions, nor do I think any democrat upon this floor is opposed to police commissions; but we are opposed to the mode in which police commissions are created and formed. As I took the opportunity of saying the other evening, when I was not called to order [laughter], Governor Seymour signed one of the bills organizing the commissioners of police. There were two democrats and two republicans in the commission, and, therefore, a large number of the voters in New York were satisfied it would not be a partisan commission; but the moment it became a partisan commission that moment it lost the confidence of the people of the city. Now, in the same way, if the democratic party should get into power, with Governor, Senate and Assembly, we might give some of you gentlemen in the rural districts a commission which you would not be very well pleased with. It is against the principle that we are fighting. I do not want it to be in the power of democrats or republicans to take away from localities the right to govern themselves. This is all that I believe there is in it. The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], the other day, stated the same fact. We are just as much in fear of a democratic commission as a republican, and what we desire is, that there shall be no partisanship whatever in these matters which affect such important interests in our cities. It is not to the word "commission" we object; but it is that where you have a large political majority, you impose upon the minority which are a majority in the city a commission that does not agree with it in political sentiment. That is all, I understand, that we object to.

Mr CURTIS—Will the gentleman —

Mr. DEVELIN—Is any body going to call me to order? [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS—Am I to understand from the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] that in the section I propose there is any provision made for a partisan commission?

Mr. DEVELIN—Yes, I do say so. It leaves it to the Legislature to make such territorial divisions as they please; and under that, they can give you just such a commission as they see fit. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] with his usual frankness and straightforwardness will admit here, that when a leading democrat—a judge in New York—was called upon by him that democrat went and made a speech from the gentleman's house to prevent its being sacked and burned.—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from New York is out of order.

Mr. DEVELIN—Well, and another judge in the city of New York, who has been attacked in this Convention —

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman's attention has been called to the fact that in discussing the riots he is departing from the question.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I move the previous question on the substitute.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. M. I. Townsend, and it was declared carried.

Mr. LOEW—I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I call for a division of the question, so that it may be taken upon the first clause and then upon the second clause of the proposed substitute.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I rise to a point of order. The substitute is offered as a whole and I submit it cannot be divided.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is not well taken. It is in the province of any gentleman to call for the division of a question.

The PRESIDENT announced the question to be on the first part of the pending substitute, as follows:

SEC. 10. The State, for the purposes of local government, shall be divided into towns, counties, cities and villages, as heretofore, and no other local divisions or districts shall be made except for sanitary and police purposes.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll on the first clause of the substitute offered by Mr. Curtis.

The name of Mr. Duganne was called.

Mr. DUGANNE—I ask to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will please state his reasons.

Mr. DUGANNE—My reasons are, sir, that I do not believe the section to be of any utility, because I believe the State has all the power at the present time.

The question was put on excusing Mr. Duganne, and it was declared lost.

Mr. DUGANNE—I vote, no.

The SECRETARY concluded the calling on the first clause of the substitute of Mr. Curtis, and it was declared adopted by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Beals, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Clarke, Corbett, Curtis, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Endress, Francis, Frank, Gould, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Kinney, Krum, Landon, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Lee, Miller, Opdyke, Pond, President, Prindle, Prosser, Reynolds, Root, Rumsey, Seaver, Silvester, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—51.

Noes—Messrs. Baker, Barto, Bergen, Cassidy, Chesebro, Colahan, Comstock, Corning, Daly, Develin, Duganne, Ferry, Field, Folger, Fowler, Garvin, Graves, Hadley, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hatch, Hitchman, Jarvis, Larremore, A. R. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Loew, Masten, Mattice, McDonald, Monell, Murphy, A. J. Parker, Potter, Rathbun, Robertson, Rogers, Rolfe, Schumaker, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen, Veeder, Verplanck, Weed, Wickham, Young—48.

Mr. FIELD—I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and ask that that motion lie upon the table.

The PRESIDENT—The motion will lie on the table, under the rule.

The question was then put on striking out the second part of the section, and it was declared to be lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Beals, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, E. P. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Case, Clarke, Curtis, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Endress, Fowler, Francis, Frank, Gould, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Kinney, Krum, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Lee, Opdyke, Pond, President, Prindle, Prosser, Reynolds, Root, Silvester, M. I. Townsend, Wakeman, Williams—43.

Noes—Messrs. Baker, Barto, Bergen, E. A. Brown, Cassidy, Chesebro, Colahan, Comstock, Corbett, Corning, Daly, Develin, Duganne, Ferry, Field, Folger, Garvin, Graves, Hadley, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hatch, Hitchman, Jarvis, Ketchum, Landon, Larremore, A. R. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Loew, Masten, Mattice, McDonald, Miller, Monell, Murphy, A. J. Parker, Potter, Rathbun, Robertson, Rogers, Rolfe, Rumsey, Schumaker, Seaver, Stratton, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen, Veeder, Verplanck, Wales, Weed, Wickham, Young—56.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Is it in order now to offer an addition to the substitute as accepted?

The PRESIDENT—An amendment of that kind is in order.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move, then, this amendment, to come in immediately after that portion of the substitute which has been accepted by the Convention: After the word "purposes" insert "All laws inconsistent with this section are abrogated from and after the 1st day of May, 1869." On which I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I am asked by several gentlemen whether that would not be the effect of the provision without the amendment? I say no; most assuredly not. The substitute or constitutional provision which has just been adopted leaves all the laws in force by which these commissions are established, and leaves the commissions in force. My amendment abrogates them from and after the 1st day of May, 1869, so as to give time for the next Legislature to supply the vacuum.

Mr. BICKFORD—Will the gentleman change it to June? My reason is that the election provided for by the article will be in April, and perhaps there would not be time for the new officers to go into power.

Mr. COMSTOCK—This Constitution, if ever adopted, will be adopted, I suppose, before the 1st day of January next, and it will give the Legislature from that time until May to adopt the necessary legislation and supply the vacuum.

Mr. FOLGER—I certainly understand the effect of the proposition which was just adopted by the Convention, as does the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], and that is the reason that I voted against it. It is an entirely unnecessary proposition for this Convention to adopt, inasmuch as it is but reiterating what we have already put into the Constitution some months ago. If it is proposed to abrogate existing laws, it needs the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. As I do not wish to abrogate them, I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The Convention will understand of course that the provision of the Constitution as already adopted preserves the police and sanitary commissions.

Mr. FOLGER—I allude to still another provision which was adopted on the motion of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] some time ago, when we were in the Assembly Chamber—the very provision under which the court of appeals has sustained the power of the Legislature to create and sustain all these commissions.

Mr. DUGANNE—It is in vain, sir, that gentlemen attempt to abrogate the State right by the simple abolition of these geographical districts. We may adopt the amendment, sir, but inherent in the State Legislature, no matter what you do, no matter what restrictions you place around cities, no matter how you provide for the election or appointment of local city officers, always and forever, while the State exists, the supreme law can delegate its State officers to act within or without any municipality. You cannot get rid of it. You may name your prohibition as you please. You may destroy these districts, civil or political, but you cannot prevent the State from appointing its own commissioners, and appointing such officers to act in any part of the State of New York. I am willing, sir, to meet the gentlemen who are opposed to commissions half way. I am prepared, as I have been to accept the compromise embodied in the minority report of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy]. I desire to harmonize the differences that exist. I wish our Constitution to go down to the people without any threat hanging over it of its rejection because of any clause in relation to cities. Not that I care about threats; not that I regard the declarations of opinions of gentlemen here as in the light at all of prophecy. I am accustomed to hear predictions from politicians, and I am used to see the people nullify such predictions, guided as the people always are, by the common sense of their own manhood. But, sir, I think that the majority in the Convention have already evinced a desire to harmonize upon the questions involved in this article upon cities. They have shown a willingness to take middle and common ground, and have invited, as I myself cordially wished, gentlemen of the minority to come and occupy the middle ground with them. I believe that commissions can be, will be, and have been abused. I think they are, at best, only safety-valves, only governors, only regulators, and should not be permanent; and therefore I object to their being made permanent by incorporation in the Constitution. I object, on the other hand, to any clause by which an independent position shall be secured to cities during the space of twenty years. For if we admit the principle that the Constitution can confer certain independent privileges and rights above the sovereign State for the period of twenty years, we admit also that the State may alienate, for ninety-nine years, or a thousand, its right of sovereignty over the territory and the government of cities. Now, sir, I think this thing has gone far enough. I believe that we should give and take as regards views or prejudices. I think, as sensible men, we ought to harmonize; and, therefore, I believe it is best to strike out these provisos altogether, and leave it to the sovereign power of the State the power and duty of regulating the affairs of cities, knowing, as we do, that the State can override by its own agencies all local officers and all local provisions that you may name in your Constitution. It is true that you may appoint officers of cities, and you may limit their powers; but you cannot prevent the State from entering upon this city and placing her officers there, and assuming the powers which have by her law been placed in the hands of elected officers; thus, in effect, leaving the elected officers powerless for good or evil, and vesting all authority in the agents of the State. Knowing this, sir, feeling that we cannot deprive the commonwealth of its sovereignty, I am yet willing, and would be glad to meet upon common ground in this article, and so adjust it that we shall prevent cities from assuming too much independence, while at the same time we inhibit the Legislature from exercising its legislation in matters of purely local jurisdiction. I therefore hope that this amendment will be voted down, simply because it assumes too much, and because what it assumes can be made inoperative at any time by the Legislature. I hope that it will be rejected, and that the entire section, on reconsideration to-morrow, will share its fate. Let us leave this matter to the Legislature, to the supreme law; and if the verdict of the people to correct any evil shall be hereafter expressed in an astounding and permanent majority of the democratic party, in heaven's name, sir, let it be so. Whenever the majority of republicans shall be in the wrong, I shall welcome the majority of democrats to right that wrong.

Mr. KRUM—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Krum, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I call for the ayes and noes.

The PRESIDENT—The ayes and noes have been ordered.

Mr. VERPLANCK moved that the Convention adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Verplanck, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. Comstock to amend the tenth section, on which the ayes and noes had been ordered.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Baker, Barto, Bergen, E. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Cassidy, Chesebro, Colahan, Comstock, Corning, Daly, Develin, C. C. Dwight, Ferry, Garvin, Graves, Hadley, Hale, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hatch, Hitchman, Jarvis, Kinney, Larremore, A. R. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Loew, Masten, Mattice, McDonald, Monell, Murphy, A. J. Parker, Potter, Prosser, Robertson, Rogers, Rolfe, Schumaker, S. Townsend, Tucker, Veeder, Verplanck, Wakeman, Wales, Weed, Wickham, Young—50.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Beals, Beckwith, Bickford, W. C. Brown, Case, Clarke, Corbett, Curtis, Duganne, Ely, Field, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Frank, Gould, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Krum, Landon, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Lee, Miller, Opdyke, C. E. Parker, Pond, President, Prindle, Rathbun, Reynolds, Root, Rumsey, Seaver, Silvester, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, Van Campen, Williams—49.

Mr. MURPHY—I wish to give notice of a motion to reconsider the section offered by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis,] amendatory of the second section, and I offer as an amendment to the section now under consideration to strike it out, and insert the following:

"No city shall be included in any other territorial division of the State for any purpose of local government unless the officers designated for such purpose, shall be chosen by the electors of such territory or appointed by some authority or authorities thereof having separately or jointly jurisdiction over all the parts of such territory, and all such existing territorial divisions are hereby abrogated."

The PRESIDENT—Does the gentleman call for the consideration of his motion to reconsider, at this time?

Mr. MURPHY—Not at this time.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table, under the rule.

Mr. CURTIS—Will it be in order to strike out this section as amended?

The PRESIDENT—It will not be in order so long as there are propositions to amend them. A motion to amend must take precedence.

Mr. AXTELL—I rise to a point of order. The point of order that I make is this—that the previous question having been moved on this section, it cannot be amended.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman form Clinton [Mr. Axtell] gave no such direction to his motion. It was simply on the pending question, which was the amendment.

Mr. KRUM—I moved the previous question, and only on the amendment.

Mr. AXTELL—I refer now to the first moving of the previous question. I thought, at the time, that the last amendment was out of order, and I did not raise the question.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that the gentleman is too late with his point of order.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I move a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will inform the gentleman that the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] has the floor.

Mr. MURPHY—This amendment is intended to bring out fairly and squarely the question of local election, or local appointment, if I may use the phrase. No proposition has, as yet, been before us, in regard to the election of police and health officers within the districts in which their duties are confined. For one, I believe it is for the interest and welfare of those communities that these districts should exist in some cases and that especially the cities of New York and Brooklyn should be united for purposes of public health. There are many conveniences and advantages attending such a union. In case of riot the transfer of the police force from one city to the other would be of great service. In matters of public health, the causes of disease are likely to be common to both cities, and should receive the harmonious action of the authorities. These objects can be best accomplished by having one common control in those matters. I therefore recognize the propriety of the metropolitan police and health district, but, at the same time, I believe that the persons who shall be in charge of them, shall be elected in the districts either by the people or by some authority emanating from the people of those districts. It is for the purpose of bringing that point distinctly before the Convention that I move this amendment.

Mr. RATHBUN—I move that this Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Rathbun, and it was declared carried by a vote of 58 to 25.

So the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 31, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. REESE.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. SILVESTER—I desire to give notice that at some future time I will move to reconsider the vote by which section 15 of the article on finance was adopted; also to reconsider the vote by which the article on the organization of the Legislature was adopted, and to reconsider the vote by which the second, fourth and seventh sections of that article were adopted.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—I yesterday gave notice that I would move to reconsider the vote by which the article on education was adopted. My object was to offer the amendment which I offered in Committee of the Whole in regard to the Cornell University, and should the ruling of the Chair require it, I give notice that I shall move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by myself and amended by the substitute of the gentleman from Ontario was adopted; and I give notice that should that prevail I will move to reconsider the vote by which that substitute was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary will note the notice as given by the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence].

Mr. GRAVES—I understood yesterday that the article on the judiciary had not been adopted.

The PRESIDENT—It has not been adopted.

Mr. GRAVES—Then, under the information given by the President yesterday, I shall move to reconsider the vote establishing the article on the judiciary, and if that be reconsidered, I will then move to reconsider the votes establishing sections 11, 16, 17 and 18 of said report;

Also, to reconsider the vote establishing the article on the Legislature and its organization, etc.;

Also, to reconsider sections 2 and 5 of said article;

Also, to reconsider the vote establishing the article on canals;

Also, to reconsider the vote establishing section 3 in said article;

Also, to reconsider the vote establishing the article upon the Governor, etc., or so much thereof as relates to the compensation of the Governor and its increase and diminution;

Also, to reconsider the vote establishing the report on the powers and duties of the Legislature.;

Also, to reconsider section 13 of that report.

The PRESIDENT—The notice given by the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] will be noted by the Secretary. The order of the day is the consideration of the article reported by the standing Committee on Cities. The pending question is on the substitute of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] for the third section. The substitute will be read for information.

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

"No city shall be included in any other territorial division of the State for any purpose of local government, unless the officers designated for such purpose shall be chosen by the electors of such territory, or appointed by some authority or authorities thereof having separately or jointly jurisdiction over all the parts of such territory, and all such existing territorial divisions are hereby abrogated."

Mr. E. BROOKS—I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the names of delegates.

The name of Mr. Smith was called.

Mr. SMITH—I ask to be excused from voting. I have paired off with Mr. Alvord, but he has not yet arrived.

The PRESIDENT—The arrangement will be recognized in accordance with the practice of the Convention.

Ayes—Messrs. Baker, Barto, Bergen, E. Brooks, Cassidy, Colahan, Comstock, Cooke, Corning, Daly, Ferry, Garvin, Graves, Gross, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Jarvis, Larremore, A. R. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Loew, Masten, Mattice, Monell, Morris, Murphy, Potter, Robertson, Rogers, Rolfe, Roy, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen, Veeder, Verplanck, Wickham—38.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Cheritree, Clarke, Corbett, Curtis, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Endress, Field, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Frank, Gould, Hadley, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Kinney, Landon, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Lee, McDonald, Miller, Opdyke, C. E. Parker, Pond, President, Prindle, Prosser, Rathbun, Reynolds, Root, Rumsey, Seaver, Silvester, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—58.

Mr. DALY—I rise to ask for information in respect to the order of business. Does the President understand that we are now acting upon the majority report in its order, or that as the basis of the action of the Convention the minority report is substituted for it?

The PRESIDENT—The basis of the action of the Convention is the majority report. The third section as amended is under consideration.

Mr. DALY—Do I understand from the Chair that after the amendments which have been pending, the order of business will be to take up the sections of the majority report as they occur in their order?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair so decides.

Mr. RUMSEY—As I understand it the third section as amended now is the tenth section of Mr. Opdyke's report.

Mr. A. F. ALLEN—I ask to have the third section as adopted by the Convention read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary will read the section.

The SECRETARY read the third section as follows:

"The State, for purposes of local government, shall be divided into towns, counties, cities and villages, as heretofore, and no other local divisions or districts shall be made except for sanitary and police purposes. All laws inconsistent with this section are abrogated from and after the first day of May, 1869."

Mr. RUMSEY—I offer the following amendment to that section:

Add at the end of section 3 the following: "Nothing in this article contained shall be construed to prohibit the Legislature from abolishing any office in such city except the office of mayor and comptroller."

There may, perhaps, be some doubt whether the clause contained in the second section that we have adopted will not constitutionalize these commissioners in the city of New York. Now, in my judgment, the whole of this question should be left to the Legislature, and if I had my way about it, I would insert nothing in this Constitution that should take from the Legislature control over the cities. At any rate I will not constitutionalize any other of the officers except those that are named in these sections, the mayor in section 1 and the comptroller in section 2, and that there may be no question in regard to the effect of this article, I offer this amendment.

Mr. VERPLANCK—My own impression is, that the best course to take now, is to lay the whole subject upon the table. We may make many improvements in the Constitution, but the people will not be satisfied with the improvements which we shall make, so long as any substantial right is withheld from any portion of the people of the State. In my own city of Buffalo, we have a police commission established by a party vote of the Legislature, under the dictation of a party caucus. I do not complain of those commissioners, or of the manner in which they have exercised their duties. It is not necessary that I should do so.

Mr. FOLGER—If the gentleman will permit me I will correct him. There was never a party caucus held on that bill, or if there was, I was not invited to it.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I was informed at the time of the passage of that bill that it was passed by direction of a caucus, and have always believed that to be the fact. If the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] says that there was no caucus, I accept his statement, but I was informed that the vote on that bill stood about forty-five to fifty in all its stages until after the caucus, when it was passed by a strict party vote under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. FOLGER—If I may correct the gentleman again, I will inform him that there is no "previous question" in the Senate.

Mr. VERPLANCK—When I speak of these things for the purpose of showing party action, I of course speak of the popular branch of the Legislature, and not of the Senate.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I would suggest to the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] whether he is not mistaken in saying that it was a legislative caucus, and whether it was not a caucus of the Assembly alone, so that the Senators had no notice of it.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I do not know how that was, but I know that at that time it was said that the bill was passed under the dictation of a caucus. We have in this legislation an instance of the progress of usurpation. The discussion on this subject has related chiefly to the city of New York. And while some gentlemen have contended that it is the sovereign right of the people of the State to legislate specially in reference to different parts of the State, the great argument in favor of such legislation has been that the city of New York from its location, from its mixed population, required special laws for its government, and that for the proper regulation and government of that city it was necessary to have a police commission appointed under the authority of the central power at Albany. Has any gentleman upon this floor ventured to say that the people of the city of Buffalo are not perfectly competent to govern themselves and to select their own police commissioners? No such statement has fallen from any gentleman in this Convention; and yet the Governor and Senate select a police commission for the city of Buffalo. And, sir, they have taken away from us not merely the control over the local police but the name of Buffalo—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair must respectfully interrupt the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck]. The Secretary will read the proposition which is under discussion.

The SECRETARY read the amendment offered by Mr. Rumsey to the third section as follows. Add at the end of section 3:

"Nothing in this article contained shall be construed to prohibit the Legislature from abolishing any office in such city, except the office of mayor and comptroller.

Digitized by Google

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] will see that he was not discussing this proposition.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I believe I am called to order by the Chair. I was referring to considerations which have actuated the committee in their votes upon this question, and it occurs to me that if I can correct any suggestion used on this occasion, I am, I think, in order, and I submit, therefore, that I am not out of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Erie will proceed in order, to discuss the proposition before the Convention.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Am I out of order in discussing it?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair thinks the gentleman is out of order in discussing it in so wide a range. The question is simply whether the Legislature shall be prohibited from abolishing any city officers except the mayor and comptroller.

Mr. VERPLANCK—That involves the question of the method of the appointment of these officers, and that is the very question I am discussing.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair cannot argue with the gentleman from Erie; he will leave it to the gentleman's own sense of propriety, of course reserving the right to call him to order if necessary.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I am very unfortunate in not being able to understand precisely what is in the President's mind; but as I am not allowed to proceed in the exercise of what I suppose to be my right as a member of this Convention—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will not abridge any right of the gentleman from Erie.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I understand that my rights are abridged, but I may be mistaken. I will content myself now with moving to lay this whole subject on the table.

Mr. COLAHAN—Upon that motion I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call the ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. AXTELL—I rise for information; I do not understand the scope of the motion of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck.]

The PRESIDENT—The motion of the gentleman from Erie is to lay this whole subject-matter on the table.

Mr. SMITH—What will be the effect of the motion?

The PRESIDENT—The effect will be that the subject will lie there until called from the table.

Mr. VERPLANCK—May I be allowed to state my object in making this motion?

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Erie may state his object.

Mr. VERPLANCK—As the chairman of the committee is absent, and as I deem it utterly useless to struggle with this matter, I think we might as well dispose of it by laying the whole subject on the table.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the ayes and noes.

The name of Mr. Murphy was called.

Mr. MURPHY—I ask to be excused from voting. I came to this Convention impressed with the necessity of reform in our municipal government by means of constitutional provisions, not only in respect to the particular question of commissions, which is the subject of so much interest and excitement here; but in regard to municipal government generally. I am not willing, therefore, sir, to give my vote as now proposed that this Convention shall not act upon this subject. I deem it my duty to stand and fight the battle of municipal reform to the end. But I find that my friends with whom I usually act are now taking a different view on this subject. I have great deference for their opinion, but I will not avoid the responsibility of carrying out my convictions against their opinion, and, withdrawing my request, vote "no."

The motion of Mr. Verplanck to lay on the table was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Baker, Barto, Bergen, Bickford, E. Brooks, Cassidy, Colahan, Corning, Develin, Ferry, Garvin, Graves, Gross, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Jarvis, Larremore, A. R. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Loew, Masten, Mattice, Monell, Morris, Potter, Robertson, Rogers, Rolfe, Roy, Schumaker, S. Townsend, Tucker, Veeder, Verplanck, Weed, Wickham—37.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Beckwith, Bell, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Cheritree, Clarke, Comstock, Cooke, Corbett, Curtis, Daly, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Field, Flagler, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Frank, Gould, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Kinney, Landon, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Lee, McDonald, Miller, Murphy, Opdyke, C. E. Parker, Pond, President, Prindle, Prosser, Rathbun, Reynolds, Root, Rumsey, Seaver, Silvester, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—60.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair desires to say in relation to the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] that it gives him great pain to seem to trench upon the rights or feelings of that gentleman, or of any delegate in this Convention, and he will now submit to the Convention the question whether the gentleman from Erie shall be heard in the line of argument marked out by him.

The question was put on allowing Mr. Verplanck to proceed, and it was declared carried unanimously.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Thanking the Convention for their courtesy, I will detain them but a few moments longer. I was about to say that, so far as the city of Buffalo is concerned, we have lost, under this police bill, even our name. The police, as established under this act, is confined to the city of Buffalo, but its name is the "Niagara frontier police," so that, from hearing the name, no one would suspect that it was the police of the city of Buffalo. I call attention to these matters, Mr. President, simply for the purpose of showing the progress of what I call usurpation on the part of the Legislature. It began in the city of New York and it has now reached the city of Buffalo. Such is always the progress of error, the progress of usurpation. It moves step by step in taking away the rights of the people; and I now ask this Convention to pause before they place in the Constitution this clause of interference with the local affairs of cities. This argument has proceeded under a misapprehension. A member of this Convention told me this morning that it was evidently the desire of the democrats to abolish commissions. Now, sir, we have been most unfortunate in this discussion if we have been so understood. Our desire is to change the mode of appointing the persons who are to control these commissions. That is all we ask. There is not a single commission in the city of New York that we have asked to have abrogated or abolished. We have not claimed here that cities may not have commissions; but what we claim is that the electors of the several cities or officers elected by the electors of the cities should appoint the officers of these commissions, instead of having them appointed at Albany, our desire being that the people may have their local matters in their own hands. It has also been claimed that this Convention have been liberal because they have followed the lead of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], who, it is said, and with truth, is a leading member of the Committee on Cities and a leading member of the party in this State. I regret that the honorable gentleman was not satisfied to move the substitute which he suggested in his minority report, when the subject came up in the Convention, instead of allowing himself to be put in a position where he could be misunderstood, as he has been misunderstood in this Convention. I know that that gentleman is with his party upon this question as to a change in the mode of appointing these commissions, and the last amendment offered by him proves that fact, and when he offered the amendment which has just been voted down, it of course opened the eyes of every member of this Convention to the fact that he stands substantially with the majority of the Committee on Cities in their report. I have said before, and I repeat, that the people of this State will not be thankful for any improvement you give them, so long as you withhold from them any right, and you should not withhold, by constitutional enactment, from the people of the city of New York, or the people of the city of Buffalo, the right to control their own police.

Mr. DALY—I propose to make one or two observations upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], but before doing so I will take the liberty, with the indulgence of the Convention, of saying something upon the general subject, which I trust will not be deemed out of order. What I have to say will be said earnestly but calmly, and with very great sincerity, as I, and the minority who think with me must abide by the action of this Convention, whatever that action may be. I voted against the last proposition to lay this whole subject on the table, because I agree with the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] that we who represent the cities of New York and Brooklyn came here with the expectation that we could get some provision embodied in the Constitution which would save those cities from the kind of legislation to which they have been subject for the past few years, and if we cannot get it, we shall have failed in accomplishing an object earnestly desired by the constituencies we respectively represent. Mr. President, I shall state what I understand to be the result of the action taken by the Convention in the adoption of the second section of the minority report of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] as that section has been amended, and I do so for the purpose of enabling me to state more explicitly what we, who represent the two largest cities in the State, object to and what we desire. I do this that there may be no misunderstanding, leaving the Convention to take what action they think proper. I raise no question as to the honesty and integrity of the motives which has led to the adoption of this amendment. I desire simply to point out the effect of it, in the hope that the Convention may recall its previous action. The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] in the minority report which he submitted, provided among other things that there should be such officers in cities as the Legislature might direct. He then went on to declare in the second section how these officers should be selected, and declared that officers for whom no provision was made in the article should be elected by the voters or appointed by the mayors of the cities. Now, an entirely different effect has been given to this provision by the amendment offered by my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], an amendment that I take the liberty of saying must have been very carefully considered, as it is very ingeniously drawn, to carry out the object which some of the gentlemen entertaining similar views to those of the gentleman from Richmond desire to accomplish. I am merely speaking of its effect and operation. That amendment changes this previous provision in the section and limits it to city officers. This term "city officers" covers but a very small class of officers, at least in the city of New York, and by limiting the provision to them there is excluded from the operation of the section the important class of officers embraced in the commissions. It certainly does exclude in the city of New York officers whose jurisdiction extends beyond the limits of that city, that is all who may be regarded as departmental or district officers, and so far as my present recollection serves me, that embraces the most important officers created by or acting under the existing commissions. The effect of this is, in the first instance, to put a positive provision in the Constitution providing for the election or appointment of city officers, which is impliedly recognizing in that instrument that those who do not now come under the designation may be appointed as the Legislature think proper. It is in fact an attempt, and an ingenious one, of declaring by the Constitution, without expressing it, the legality and propriety of the present mode of appointing the officers of the health, police, excise and other commissions. Now, the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] proposes to qualify this effect by the substitution of the tenth section of the majority report for the third section, but this, in my judgment, will not accomplish the purpose he has in view or restore the section to what it was. I do not propose to debate the question. I will state upon my reputation as a lawyer, that the construction of these two sections, if adopted; even supposing the latter one calculated in some degree to effect the object which the gentleman had in view, would, lead to endless litigation. Time is too precious to argue that question fully now, and I content myself simply with making this statement upon my professional reputation. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] amends the tenth section (which has been converted into the third section of the majority report) by declaring that "no local division or district shall be made except for sanitary and police purposes."

Mr. COMSTOCK—That is not my amendment.

Mr. DALY—That is the section read as amended.

Mr. COMSTOCK—That is the section without my amendment.

Mr. DALY—I may be mistaken. I supposed from the reading of the section —

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary will read the section for information.

The SECRETARY read as follows:

"The State, for purposes of local government, shall be divided into counties, towns, cities and villages, as heretofore, and no other local divisions or districts shall be made except for sanitary or police purposes."

Mr. COMSTOCK moved to add as follows:

"All laws inconsistent with this section are abrogated from and after the first day of May, 1869."

Which was adopted.

Mr. DALY—Then I understood it correctly, and I say in reference to the section even in its present form, as now further amended, that in my judgment it would still create infinite difficulty and litigation. As I have already said, I do not propose to argue the matter, but I will simply suggest that the inquiry—"What are police purposes?" would with me if I were called upon as a judge to determine it in its connection with the local affairs of the city I represent, and with which I profess to be familiar, give rise to the greatest perplexity, and I say this with all respect to the gentleman who proposed the amendment. I have thus stated what will be the effect, in my judgment, of the provisions to which this Convention has given its sanction, and I propose now to state what it is that we of the city of New York object to, and what we desire, so that there may be a clear and fair understanding. What I complain of is, that this amendment of the second section is drawn that it may effect an object without indicating the object to be effected in such a way that it required a great deal of study on my part before I could understand the real bearing and effect of it. This is not the way in which a constitutional provision, which is to become the fundamental law, should be enacted. Let the whole scope and meaning of the article under consideration be distinctly understood, and then if the Convention determine that they will not incorporate in the fundamental law what we, representing one of the principal cities of the Union, think necessary for its protection, let the Convention say so distinctly and clearly, and not seek to accomplish an object or avoid a reponsibility, by ingenious contrivances like this amendment. Let the majority deal with us in a straightforward manner, and if they overrule us, we will submit and concede that here, at least, the question is settled, and that we have our appeal to the people. Mr. President, in the first place, what we desire, so far as I understand the expression of opinion upon the part of my colleagues, either upon this floor or off it is, that we desire the enactment of that provision of the majority report which makes the mayors of cities, and consequently the mayor of the city of New York, an officer of that dignity and character which the chief executive officer of that great metropolis should be, that restores to him those powers which have been diminished by a course of successive legislation for a period of nearly twenty years, and puts him in his true position as the real executive head of the city government. The plan of the majority separates in the first place from the general organization of the city the department of finance, which, in our city, is the largest of any city in the United States. It leaves that great department where it is now, under the comptroller who is elected by the electors of the city, and has the power of appointing his subordinates. The plan then provides that the mayors of cities shall be elected for three years; but whether for three or two years, is not a matter of much consequence. It provides that the mayor shall have the power of appointing the heads of the departments, and that the departments shall have the power of appointing their subordinates; thereby recognizing the necessity of having as the head of the great executive organization of a city like New York, an officer directly responsible for those whom he selects as the heads of departments, and through that responsible, to a certain extent, for those whom they appoint as their subordinates. What we object to is not commissions as such, for it is of little consequence whether they are called commissions or departments. Some of them are undoubtedly efficient and well administered, and will perhaps, retain their present shape in any form of the city government. The objection at present is, that there are eight or ten of them representing the complex machinery of the government of a city like New York, and that each of them is independent of the other. No one has any check upon the other. There is no unity, no systematic organization of the whole, and no responsibility, except so far as it may exist under the three modes in which the heads of departments are appointed. A power exercised not in the locality, not in the city of New York, but here in the city of Albany. These three modes are: first, by naming the individuals in the act creating the organization or commission; second, by appointment by the Governor of the State; and third, as in the case of the police commissioners, by a vote of the Legislature, which is, in my judgment, one of the worst modes of appointment which was ever devised. These are the three modes by which the chief officers at the head of and who control the executive departments in the city of New York, with the exception of the board of education, are appointed, and our objection, clearly and distinctly stated, is, that the cities of New York and Brooklyn are deprived thereby, through the acts of the Legislature of the right of local self-government, which is one of the chief distinguishing features of our republican institution. That they are, and have been, kept in this State for no better reason than the unfounded one given by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], that they are different from all other cities, or, in the language of the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould], because they are, as contrasted with the other parts of the State, so impure and vicious, and that gentleman conveys his idea of the city which I have the honor to represent by comparing it to a common sewer—that general receptacle of every species of filth and impurity. He would have us believe that there is, in that city, an aggregation, upon a scale so extensive and so unexampled, of vice, corruption, immorality and crime, that it must be governed by a totally different system from that which exists in other cities in the State or in the Union, or in other countries. It is a very common thing with gentlemen dwelling in rural districts to entertain such sentiments respecting metropolitan cities with which they have little practical acquaintance. To put themselves upon an elevated pinnacle, and air their virtue with the complacent reflection, "I am holier than thou." It is an innocent self-deception, and one with which we of the city of New York, are not disposed to quarrel or disturb by expressing our opinion of those, from the other parts of the State, who have controlled its legislation for the past few years. We have no desire to protract discussion; no desire to create animosities, for there has been little to complain of upon that ground in the Convention, the intercourse of the members having been, throughout, courteous and pleasant. All that we desire is that the question of the municipal right of the city we represent shall be distinctly passed upon. That we shall not be cut off by intermediate provisions, but that action may be deferred until we come to the seventh and eighth sections of the majority report, which clothes, in language carefully expressed, the chief magistrate of a city with powers which, in our city, at least, we deem essential to the dignity, influence and importance of his station, and that then that section shall be deliberately passed upon, and either adopted or rejected, as an expression of what this Convention means to do, or not to do. Having said this, I now desire to say that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] has at least this merit in it, that it does distinctly modify the operation or effect of the second section, so that it shall not take away from the Legislature the power of abolishing any one of these offices, which might possibly, from the peculiar language used, be the construction of that section as adopted, and in that respect the section is better with this amendment than without it. In conclusion, I will say in general terms that what we particularly wish—and by "we" I mean the city of New York—is that we may by a provision in the Constitution have our very complex municipal government symmetrically organized, under a responsible head, and not composed, as it is now, of disjointed and independent parts; and that that head should be the mayor of the city. He is now but the nominal head, for he is nearly shorn of every power. Large powers which he previously possessed, and which the mayors of other cities possess, have, by successive acts of legislation, been separated from the office and lodged in the commissions, or in the common council, either of which bodies, in the exercise of them, act independently of him. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] stated the other evening the position in which he found himself as mayor of the city when the riots took place. He said he asked the police commissioners to call out the military, and that they would not do it; that they did not know whether they had the power. He looked into the question to see whether he had the power, and he thought he had under the operation of an old statute. I think, in all courtesy, that he was mistaken. I once had occasion to examine that question in reference to the Astor place riot, and the conclusion I arrived at was that the mayor had not that power.

Mr. OPDYKE—If the gentleman will allow me, I stated that I had serious doubts of my right under that law, because I thought it had been taken away by the act creating the metropolitan police; but, under the necessities of the case, I assumed the power and took the responsibility.

Mr. DALY—I misunderstood the gentleman. I merely cited the case as an illustration. That gentleman did what any magistrate should have done under like circumstances; he took the responsibility as General Jackson did at New Orleans, and saved the city by so doing. I ask is this the condition in which a great city should be placed? With eight or ten commissions, all separate and independent, and one of them, the police commission, doubtful of its power in an imminent public emergency. A municipal government in detached parts, without cohesiveness or a common head. My colleague from New York [Mr. A. R. Lawrence], the other evening, showed, by details, the practical workings of this system, and that it had resulted in an enormous increase of the public expense. What we most particularly want is that there should be in our city, as in every other city, some one officer who represents the city. Mr. President, there is not in any city in the world, with which I am familiar, a chief magistrate occupying so humiliating a position as the mayor of the city of New York. Why, sir, in France, where centralization is carried out as a system, it is not as bad; for, if I am not mistaken, the mayor of Paris has more power at the present time than Mayor Hoffman has in the city of New York. I ask the question in all sincerity, is it the deliberate judgment of the members of this Convention that the city of New York should be left in this state? The gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] says that it is a matter to be left to the Legislature. We ask that it shall not be left to the Legislature. If this Convention agree with him and mean to leave the whole subject alone, very well. Let the Convention so express itself clearly and unmistakably. Our proposition is a distinct one. We ask that there shall be incorporated in the Constitution, imbedded there as a fundamental principle, a provision by which the mayor of New York, like the mayors of other cities, shall have the power to appoint the heads of departments, instead of having a number of independent departments, the heads of which are appointed by and responsible only to the central power at Albany. We care not whether that central power be democratic or republican. We say it is fundamentally wrong, and that it is a violation of the right of local government. I use the word right not in the sense that it is not in the sovereign power of the people to order otherwise. My friend, Mr. Stratton, must have a very low opinion of my character as a lawyer, if he supposes I meant to say that, without a constitutional provision it would not be in the power of the Legislature to deprive the city of New York of any right. Undoubtedly, the sovereign power is in the Legislature, as representing the people, except so far as it is restricted by constitutional provisions. Where they do not exist it is independent, and it may deprive the city of New York of any rights except what is secured by the provision in the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees at least to every State a republican form of government. I thank the Chair for indulging me in making these remarks, and I thank the Convention for the attention with which they have listened. I think that I am not assuming too much in saying that the desire of my colleagues, so far as the city of New York is concerned, is that, there shall be a clear and distinct vote upon the question whether the provision in the report of the majority of the Committee on Cities, providing for the appointment of a mayor, who shall have power to appoint the heads of departments, shall be incorporated in the Constitution or not. If that is not incorporated in the Constitution, I think we all agree, that, so far as regards the other provisions it is not very material to us what the Convention shall do in respect to them. Some of them will undoubtedly have to be stricken out. I have only a word more to say, if I may be permitted to say it without departing from the rules of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Duganne] said something in regard to rising upon this floor and prophesying. Now, Mr. President, I did say something the other night in regard to the effect of disregarding the wishes of the people of the city of New York. I said it in all sincerity, not desiring to assume the mantle of the prophet, but to express simply my opinion, and I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that early in the summer, with equal sincerity, I said in this Convention that, in my judgment, the provision which the majority were about to incorporate into the Constitution in regard to negro suffrage would result in the defeat of the Constitution. The gentleman and those who voted with him thought otherwise and incorporated that provision in the Constitution. He no doubt thought the opinion then expressed as unfounded as the one I now express, and if he and they are of the same mind still I will leave it to the future to determine, if the Constitution is submitted in that shape, whether my judgment or theirs was right. It cannot be determined until the Constitution is voted upon, but the fate which has attended a similar provision in the elections which have since occurred in Ohio and other States, is an unmistakable indication of the opinion of the people and foreshadows what the result will be in this State. These elections have no doubt convinced many members of the majority of the necessity of a separate submission of that question, when nothing else would. I urge upon the majority now the necessity, if they wish to have the Constitution adopted, of protecting the municipal rights of the city of New York from legislative encroachment. I repeat what I have already said, that there is a deep-seated feeling in the city of New York upon this subject, which has been intensified by the course of legislation that has been pursued in respect to that city since 1857, and for some years previously. I say it again as my deliberate opinion, that if there is not some provision in the fundamental law to protect that city from this disposition on the part of the Legislature—some provision to save it from this encroachment of the central power upon the local right of self-government—then the great mass of the electors of that city will record their votes against this Constitution. They will not, if they can help it, submit to be governed in their local matters by the people of the State. They will insist, and never cease to insist, upon a right recognized in every other part of the State and denied to them alone. They consider it one of the most important rights which a municipality can claim, and when the time comes they will so express themselves.

Mr. BICKFORD—I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] a question. I wish to ask whether he and his constituents intend to make the question of the control of the police in the city of New York sine qua non in the matter of giving their support to this Constitution—whether nothing else will satisfy them?

Mr. DALY—I suppose I have answered the gentleman's question by stating that the seventh and eighth sections of the majority report is what we desire to have enacted. There is no reason that I can see why the head of the police department should be appointed in Albany and the heads of the other departments in New York.

Mr. GARVIN—I desire to suggest to my colleague [Mr. Daly] that I did not clearly understand him in his remarks in reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey]. That amendment provides, as I understand it, a prohibition in terms that no other or different commissions shall be created for the city of New York, except such as have been already provided for in this Constitution; in other words, that for police and sanitary purposes the Legislature may exercise exclusive control, but as regards all other things the Legislature shall—

Mr. RUMSEY—The amendment I offered simply declares that the construction of that section shall not be such as to prohibit the Legislature from abolishing offices in the city of New York, except those of mayor and comptroller.

Mr. GARVIN—I would like to know if my colleague [Mr. Daly] declared himself in favor of the amendment?

Mr. DALY—I am against the whole section; but as I hastily read the amendment of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], it seemed to me to be an improvement upon the existing section, as it does not restrain the Legislature, which I think the section does, from abolishing any of these commissions if the Legislature should think proper to do so hereafter. It may possibly be liable to the construction which my colleague [Mr. Garvin] puts upon it, that it is a distinct recognition that they shall not create any additional commissions: but I have not viewed it in that light, and it does not strike me as susceptible of that construction.

Mr. ROBERTSON—The proposition, as I understand it now, is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], that the Legislature shall not, by any construction or by any expressed language contained in the section, be deprived of the right of removing any officer except the mayor and the comptroller of the city.

Mr. RUMSEY—The gentleman's colleague [Mr. Daly] insisted that the probable construction of section 2 was that it legalized the existence of all the officers in the city now existing. This amendment was framed to avoid that probable construction. That is all there is of it.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I am opposed to this. In the first place, I regret to differ from my friend from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], who is always discreet, always prudent, as to the necessity of introducing this clause in the Constitution. I do it because I think it tends in some measure to sustain the heresy, which has been attempted to be forced upon us as a necessary conclusion from the arguments of those, who are willing that the cities should be allowed to govern themselves by their own inherent power, and self-respect and intelligence and morality, and implies that the Legislature may be deprived of the authority over cities, which they have, over the rest of the State. I do not pretend to assert, and I presume that no one, who thinks with me, will pretend to assert that the Legislature of the State of New York, by any thing contained in this Constitution, as adopted or reported, would be deprived for one moment of the power of abolishing every city in the State, and every town and every village, and creating some kind of government over the population of those cities or towns which would be neither urban, nor town, nor village. A city when created is altogether a creature of legislation. There is not an institution in this State created by the Legislature of the State which is not its creature, and cannot to-morrow be driven out of existence, cannot be shorn of its power so that it may fail hereafter to be known in history by any name. The city of New York is a time-honored institution, and has come down to us as one well known in the history of the State of New York. But when we are talking of the organic institutions of this State, or in reference to the administration of justice, and the enforcement of laws for the preservation of order and property, and rights throughout the whole State, who has dared to say upon this floor or elsewhere that the people of the State of New York represented by its constituted governing authorities has not the power to destroy, and has not the power to reduce the city of New York to a congeries of towns, villages or rural settlements, or has not the power to reduce the city of Brooklyn into the original fragmentary settlements from which it sprung, leaving those original settlements to be simply parts of the county of Kings. But we ask, whoever the thing known as a city from time immemorial, as the necessary creation of the law, shall come into existence—when it is created to govern a large and compact body of people, having various interests—when it is necessary to have a government which is to control and direct, and watch the interests of that vast body of people, that the Legislature shall not interfere, or undertake to intermeddle, either for private, political or any other purposes with the government of that city. We do not say to the Legislature "Do not unmake the city of New York—do not forfeit its charter—do not level down the bulwark of protection of the Constitution"—but we say, "When you make a city, you must not touch that city so as to interfere with its internal government" That is the whole question in this case. Why have we gone into the question whether the police commission has been properly administered, and whether the sanitary commission has been productive of good health in the city and the State? Why have we gone into the question, whether the suppression of intemperance in drinking and the suppression of crime by commissions in New York has been successful or not? What are all these things but rallying cries of party which would have been much better bandied in the newspapers, or on the stump, than indulged in here, because we have not time to indulge in them in our deliberations in this Convention. These commissions may all have been well managed. We may have their good management paraded before us, but will any gentleman say that the cities of this State, within their own borders, cannot furnish as good men as can be furnished by the authorities of the State to administer the laws within their boundaries.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND — I feel myself constrained, Mr. President, to rise to a question of order. I do not wish to interrupt gentlemen in this debate, which has lasted for ten days, but I think my friend from New York [Mr. Robertson] is not in order in the course of remark.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] is in order.

Mr. ROBERTSON — I had thought I had placed myself in a position to be well understood, as I meant to throw aside all these debatable and party considerations, and plant myself upon the impregnable rock of principle. Cities, whether you call them necessary evils or a great good, exist in every country. In every place where the State thrives, where it has an industrious, energetic population, where it has commercial advantages, and where it has empire, cities must spring up. They are acknowledged by our Constitution. Where do we get the name of cities? Are we creating cities for the first time by a Constitution, or are we adopting a name known to all of us as distinguishing a form of government of bodies of men gathered around a commercial center, a name as much recognized as State, or people or nation? I only say that when we do this, when we make a city, let us make it one indeed with all its powers and energies unimpaired; let it be self-formed; let us not ask the rest of the State for aid except in case of foreign invasion; let us govern ourselves in the city as you let any other great and growing people do. The inhabitants of the city of New York are a people now equal in numbers to many of the States of the United States, while in wealth we are far greater. We are allowed to elect members of the Assembly and Senators, and to vote for Governor, the chief executive of this State, and yet it is contended that we are not capable of electing our own local officers or boards, which are to arrange and control the administration of our local affairs, which are of the highest interest to the population within the borders of that city. The city of New York has been taken as an exemplar for all other cities, and I would ask what it is which makes it necessary that the control of the city of New York in its local government, should be handed over to the Legislature. If the city is so sunk in vice, so debased in poverty, ignorance and immorality; if we have all these evils existing there, in so intense a degree that the people cannot bear up under it, existing as a city, abolish your city. Do not in the face of the world have it said that we are incapable of governing ourselves, and that we are only capable of government, when that government is spread over the entire State. Monarchists and others taunt us with the idea that men cannot govern themselves. Are you ready to say that a large body of people in a republican government are only capable of helping to govern the State, and are not capable of governing themselves? Are you ready to say that there are people who are competent to elect Governors, State officers, Senators and members of Assembly; but are yet not competent to elect police commissioners for their own government? Is not this absurd and contradictory of itself? Does it not overthrow the principle of republican government? Does it not say with one voice, "you, as a part of the people, are competent to participate in the government," and then say, "you are not capable, but must go to the Legislature?" I will not say any thing about the fairness, justice, and energy with which these commissions have been administered; but I mean to say that we can get as good men in the city of New York to fill these commissions, as can be appointed by the Governor of this State. We have a mayor of the city of New York, who last year was candidate for the office of the Chief Executive of the State, and he only lost his election by a very small majority. If he had been successful in his appeal to the people, and the sphere of his public life had been enlarged to take in the whole State, I ask whether he would have gained any broader range of vision in regard to the political institutions of the State, than he has, where he is, with hardly any power, and with no higher functions than to appear on fete days, to receive foreign visitors to the city of New York, to issue an occasional proclamation, and to veto bills making sewers to the city? I would ask whether he would acquire by that transfer, virtues which he does not have in his present position? If we can select a man in the city of New York, competent to become Governor of the State, I would ask if we are not equally competent to furnish men to fill inferior positions. I am unwilling to have on the face of this Constitution any thing which implies that it has assumed anywhere that the Legislature of this State and the power of this State, cannot at any time abolish any city, town or village in this State, whenever the existence of that city or village is inconsistent with the safety and welfare of the people of the State; but until then I ask that they be left autonomous.

Mr. WAKEMAN—Mr. President, I have been, in the past, in favor of giving to the cities of this State all the power they should have, consequently, I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] last night. My design has been to restore to the cities all the power that has been taken from them, except, perhaps, in the two instances of the police and sanitary regulations, which have been already excepted. I did suppose, sir, that if we should allow the cities to control the affairs in them in all particulars except these two, the gentlemen representing the cities would be satisfied, rather than to say here that the whole Constitution should be voted down unless they could have the entire control in their own way. I was in the Legislature in 1857, when the celebrated metropolitan police bill was passed, and I know well the position of things then. People came to Albany from the city of New York without distinction of party, asking us to do something to improve the police arrangements of that city, and although the ultimate vote was a party vote, almost entirely so in the Assembly, that bill was not at the time regarded or asked for as a party measure. There seemed to be a necessity for something to be done, and the citizens of New York appealed to the Legislature for aid. It may again happen that the power of the Legislature may be invoked, and I would ask if it is proper that we should withdraw all power of the Legislature over, the subjects that I have mentioned, so that the Legislature can have no control whatever over the cities. I, sir, have no doubt at the present day, in view of what has taken place in the organization of the metropolitan police, that the city of New York would organize a police that would be a respectable body, and perhaps answer every purpose; but let me ask gentlemen here, suppose that we withdraw the power of the Legislature from interfering, in case the police should at any time be what it ought not to be for the public interests, and not be such a police as is required for the protection of the city of New York, should there not be some power behind the cities to interfere and have a remedy for the difficulty? I believe now I should be willing, as a legislator, to vote to give the cities a right to appoint their own police, reserving the right, however, to interfere in case the system did not work well. Is there not a distinction as between the police and the sanitary regulations of the State and those functions that are performed by these other commissions? I think there is. Formerly, in the history of our State, the Governor had the power of appointing sheriffs, district attorneys, judges, etc. At the present time he is the chief executive of the State, and commander of the military forces, and he is charged with a faithful execution of the laws of the State. More than that, sir, he has to surrender up criminals when properly demanded by the Governors of other States. He is the chief police officer of the State, if I may so term him. Now, sir, in reference to this matter. I submit that while, as a general rule, local authorities should have control of their affairs, yet, inasmuch as I, and citizens generally are interested to be protected in cities, the Legislature should retain the power to see that all are adequately protected. I have always admired the language of an officer in Massachusetts who said when he was assaulted, "I do not care any thing about this matter personally myself, but I give you to understand if you shake me you shake the Commonwealth of Massachusetts." I think so far as the police regulation of cities is concerned, it should be backed by the whole power of the State, whether the regulations be applied to the city of New York, the city of Buffalo, or the village of Batavia where I reside. Now, gentlemen have complained here because we make one law for the country and another for the city. What I have been willing and anxious to do, is to give the cities some constitutional provision to protect them. I had hoped that the delegates would be willing and satisfied if they could receive a constitutional indorsement here of their views in regard to the matter except as to the sanitary and police regulations of the State. Gentlemen know full well that every portion of the people of this State are interested in the question of the sanitary regulations of the city of New York. Much depends upon that regulation whether or not the pestilence shall be introduced into the city of New York, and thence be conveyed over the length and breadth of the State. Are they not willing that we should reserve the power to interfere in case the city of New York should not properly protect the rights, property and health of the people of the city by their regulations. I am willing to go with the gentlemen from New York so far as I can, and give them control of their own municipal affairs, but I think in these particulars which I have referred to, there should be an exception. If gentlemen are not satisfied with this and prefer to leave the whole subject under the control of the Legislature where it is now, and have no enactment whatever, I will unite with them in that proposition, but it seems to me that the gentlemen had better except police and sanitary regulations. I would even give them control of that, but with the reservation that the Legislature might interfere in case the city of New York should not in its police and sanitary regulations act for the best interests of the people. I merely rose to state my position and to explain what might seem an inconsistency with the vote I had previously given.

Mr. AXTELL—As this subject has been some ten days under discussion, and we have listened to many speeches, I move the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey].

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I hope that the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Mr. ROBERTSON — As several gentlemen have changed their views on this subject, and for the purpose of further discussion, I move to lay the matter on the table.

The PRESIDENT—The motion for the previous question takes precedence.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell to order the previous question, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 45 to 35.

The PRESIDENT announced the question on the amendment offered by Mr. Rumsey.

The ayes and noes were called for, and a sufficient number seconding the call they were ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON—Did the Chair state that my motion to lay the subject on the table was out of order?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair holds that the motion for the previous question takes precedence: In the list of motions the motion for the previous question stands No. 4, and the motion to lay on the table No. 5.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll on the amendment of Mr. Rumsey.

The name of Mr. Van Campen was called.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I desire to be excused from voting. I desired to obtain the floor in order to state my position. I differ with my party as to the manner of selecting officers, and as this question involves the whole principle, I desire to be excused.

The question was put on excusing Mr. Van Campen from voting, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY concluded the calling of the roll, and the amendment of Mr. Rumsey was declared carried by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Baker, Beals, Beckwith, Bergen, Bickford, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Case, Cheritree, Clarke, Comstock, Cooke, Corbett, Curtis, Daly, Duganne, O C Dwight, Ely, Endress, Field, Fowler, Francis Frank, Garvin, Gould, Hadley, Hammond, Hand, Harris, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Jarvis, Kinney, Landon, Lapham, Larremore, A. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, McDonald, Miller, Murphy, Opdyke, C. E. Parker, Pond, President, Prindle, Prosser, Rathbun, Reynolds, Robertson, Root, Rumsey, Schumaker, Seaver, Silvester, Smith, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Wickham, Williams—70.

Noes—Messrs. Alvord, Cassidy, Colahan, Corning, Ferry, Flagler, Graves, Gross, Hardenburgh, Ketcham, Livingston, Loew, Mattice, Monell, Morris, A. J. Parker, Potter, Rogers, S. Townsend, Tucker, Veeder, Verplanck—24.

Mr. JARVIS—I offer the following amendment. Add to the section as amended the following:

"The persons, however, now filling the offices of mayor and comptroller in the cities of New York and Brooklyn respectively, shall continue in office until the expiration of their several terms as now established by law."

Mr. GARVIN—Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that he put in the words—"the mayor of any city in the State?" If this article is intended to reach the other cities in the State, we had better so express it.

The PRESIDENT—Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. Garvin] offer a further amendment?

Mr. GARVIN—Merely to cover other cities in the State; put in the words "and other cities in the State."

Mr. JARVIS—I accept the amendment.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I move that after the word "comptroller" the word "chamberlain" be inserted, because in many of the cities of the State the person who is called the comptroller, in other cities is called the chamberlain.

Mr. JARVIS—I accept the amendment.

Mr. LOEW—I would move to amend the amendment by including "all other city and county officers"—these words to be inserted after the word "chamberlain."

Mr. GARVIN—These are all mentioned in the article.

Mr. ALVORD—I suggest that it would be better to use the term "financial officers," instead of comptroller and chamberlain.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I accept the amendment.

Mr. JARVIS—I accept it also.

Mr. LAPHAM—I would suggest that the better form would be the words "all officers in the cities elected by the people."

Mr. JARVIS—I accept the amendment; and I would, with the permission of the Convention, strike out the word "however" in the amendment.

The SECRETARY read the amendment as amended as follows:

"All officers elected by the people in any of the cities of this State, shall continue in office until the expiration of their several terms, as now established by law."

Mr. HARRIS—I would suggest to the gentlemen who have proposed these various amendments which have been embodied in the one suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Jarvis] whether or not it is better to admit them now. In every Constitution there is an article, generally called the "schedule," and in our present Constitution there is such an article which provides for all these miscellaneous cases which are but temporary in effect. It is the last article in the Constitution, and in which we shall probably have to provide for cases of this kind, before we finish this Constitution, and these cases should go into that schedule or article at the end of the Constitution, which provides for the manner of its going into effect. It seems to me it would be better than to embody it in this article, which is permanent in its operation.

Mr. OPDYKE—It would be entirely competent for the Committee on Revision to transpose the amendment to the schedule; for myself, I am in favor of the proposed amendment.

Mr. DALY—I was about to make the same observation. I regard the amendment as indispensably necessary, and particularly in reference to the financial officers of the city.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Jarvis, and it was declared carried.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I wish to say a word or two only with regard to the article now under consideration, which I shall follow with a motion to lay on the table. That part of the action of this Convention which is obnoxious to the citizens of the city of New York, is embodied in those two lines, "except for sanitary and police purposes." Under the power which is now to be embodied in the Constitution of this State, and which has never been embodied in any previous Constitution, authority will be given to fasten for all time by constitutional enactment these privileges, or these impositions, I might say rather, upon the city of New York. Now, Mr. President, what is meant by "police purposes?" Police purposes may cover any thing under the sun. "There is no way," it is said, "to judge of the future but by the past," and judging from the past what has been the power exercised in the city of New York in the matter of the police? Take the action of the last Legislature for example. They gave the police power over the licensing of hacks in the city of New York; over the licensing of omnibusses; over all those little affairs which properly belong to the local government; and though it is true that that law was declared to be unconstitutional by the court of appeals, it was an authority so exercised for the time, and it led to a great conflict of opinion in the city of New York, and to a very expensive litigation in that city. This kind of State power was exercised by the Legislature through the police of New York. Take another and more important example, Mr. President, and that is the excise system. All the power which belongs to it is conferred upon the police of the city of New York; and therefore, I say, that under these two powers, the one relating to the sanitary affairs of the city, and the other relating to the police of the city, you may embody every other commission in these two, and have supreme control over the city. Now, sir, as one who wishes well to the final action upon the Constitution, as one who desires to see the language and principles we may put in it adopted by the people, and that no undue prejudices may be awakened against it, I for one, and I believe the great body of my friends concur with me, prefer that the law should remain as it is, and that the Legislature should have the power that they now have, and that these two provisions should be embodied in the fundamental law of the land. Therefore I move to lay this whole subject upon the table, believing that a greater good will result in the end from such a motion than there will from adopting the full section of the article.

Mr. MURPHY—I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. RUMSEY—Is a motion in order to amend that motion?

The PRESIDENT—A motion to lay upon the table cannot be amended or debated.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. E. Brooks, and it was declared lost, by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Alvord, Baker, Bergen, Bickford, E. Brooks, Cassidy, Comstock, Corning, Daly, Ferry, Garvin, Graves, Gross, Hadley, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hatch, Jarvis, Ketcham, Larremore, A. R. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Loew, Masten, Mattice, Morris, Rathbun, Robertson, Roy, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen, Wickham—34.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Armstrong, Axtell, Beals, Beckwith, Bell, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Cheritree, Clarke, Colahan, Cooke, Corbett, Curtis, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Endress, Field, Flagler, Fowler, Francis, Frank, Gould, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Kinney, Landon, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Lee, McDonald, Murphy, Opdyke, C. E. Parker, Pond, Potter, President, Prindle, Prosser, Reynolds, Root, Rumsey, Schumaker, Seaver, Silvester, Smith, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, Veeder, Verplanck, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—60.

Mr. CURTIS—My friend and colleague from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] has stated that the great difficulty in the section is contained in the two lines in the third section as adopted: "And no other local divisions or districts shall be made except for sanitary and police purposes." If there is no further amendment to that section, I have a motion to offer.

The PRESIDENT—Are there amendments to this section? None being offered, the Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis].

Mr. CURTIS—I move that the section be stricken out.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—On that motion I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. C. C. Dwight, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. Curtis to strike out the third section.

Mr. McDONALD—I ask for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Curtis to strike out, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the fourth section as follows:

SEC. 4. The common council in New York and Brooklyn and the board of aldermen in other cities, shall possess such powers as may be conferred upon them by the Legislature, but they shall have no executive powers.

Mr. LAPHAM—I move to substitute for that section the second section of the article reported by that portion of the committee represented by Mr. Opdyke. That is a substitute properly following the two already adopted, providing the manner in which the mayor may be removed.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the substitute offered by Mr. Lapham, as follows:

"Any mayor may be removed by the Governor, but only after due notice and an opportunity of being heard in defense, and for causes to be assigned in the order of removal. In case the office of any mayor shall become vacant before the expiration of the term for which he was elected the Governor shall fill the vacancy until the next annual charter election."

Mr. VERPLANCK—I think this amendment is not germane to the subject under consideration.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman that the rule adopted by the Convention is that one amendment must be germane to another, but as to an amendment to the section he must leave it to the Convention to determine for itself whether it would be proper or improper.

Mr. ALVORD—I have been absent and do not know the action of the Convention upon the second section reported by the majority. I wish to say, however, in this connection that gentlemen should pause and reflect before they undertake to make so radical a change as this in the fundamental law of the State. Why, sir, you virtually put the power of the cities of this State in the hands of the Governor. He may get up specious pretexts for the removal of the mayor, and remove him, and you give him, it seems to me, the right and power to put a person in his place until the next election; giving the power to the Governor of the State in this locality to remove the executive of every city of this State.

Mr. CURTIS—I think the gentleman will find in the majority report that that is provided for.

Mr. ALVORD—Not by any means—no, sir. In case the office of any mayor shall become vacant before the expiration of the term for which he was elected, the powers and duties of the office shall devolve upon the presiding officer of the board of aldermen, until the vacancy shall be filled. That is the majority report, sir. It is right and proper, and we agree that the Governor of this State should have the power under certain circumstances of removing the executive heads of cities; but he should not have, it seems to me, the power of putting one of his own creatures in the place of the mayor. It should be given to the local authorities in some way to fill the vacancies; for otherwise you give to the Governor the power to remove executive heads of the different cities of this State, and take the whole control of those cities in his own hands. I trust we are not so anti-republican and anti-democratic as to go to any such extent as this.

The question was put on the substitute offered by Mr. Lapham, and it was declared lost.

Mr. RUMSEY—I move to strike out the fourth section.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Rumsey, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the fifth section, as follows:

SEC. 5. Every act, ordinance, resolution or proceeding which shall have passed the two boards of the common council of New York or Brooklyn, or the board of aldermen of any other city, shall, before it shall take effect, be presented to the mayor for his approval; if he approve it, he shall sign it; if not, he shall return it to the board in which it originated, with his objections, within ten days, or at the next stated meeting of such board thereafter. Such board, after the expiration of ten days from the time of such return, may proceed to consider such act, ordinance, resolution or proceeding, and if, upon such reconsideration, two-thirds of all the members elected to each board of the common council of New York or Brooklyn, or to the board of aldermen of any other city, shall agree to pass the same—or, if the mayor shall not return any such act, ordinance, resolution or proceeding, within the time above limited for that purpose, it shall take effect as if he had approved it.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—Believing, as I do, that this section, as well as very much that follows in this article, is proper matter for legislative cognizance, and such cognizance only, I move to strike out this section.

The PRESIDENT—If there is no motion to amend the section, that proposition will be entertained.

The question was put on the motion offered by Mr. C. C. Dwight to strike out, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY then proceeded to read the sixth section, as follows:

SEC. 6. Boards of aldermen and assistant aldermen shall choose their own president and clerk, and such other officers as they may deem necessary.

Mr. CURTIS—I move to strike out this section for the same reason.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Curtis to strike out, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETAR proceeded to read section 7 as follows:

SEC. 7. The comptroller or chief financial officer and the receiver of taxes and assessments of New York and Brooklyn shall be chosen by the electors of the city. Their respective terms of office shall be three years. They shall appoint all subordinate officers in their respective departments. They may be removed in the same manner as a mayor may be removed by the Governor. In case either of said offices shall become vacant before the expiration of the term for which the officer was elected, such vacancy shall be filled by the Governor until the next city election, except that when the vacancy shall be created by removal, it shall be filled by the board of aldermen.

Mr. CURTIS—We have already provided, in a section already adopted, for the appointment of this chief financial officer; and I believe he is now liable to be removed in the manner provided in another section. I move, therefore, that this section be stricken out.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Curtis to strike out, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read section 8 as follows:

SEC. 8. Heads of departments and officers charged with the administration of departments shall be appointed by the mayor. Subordinate officers of departments shall be appointed by the heads or other officers in charge of such departments. All other executive officers shall be appointed by the mayor. Any officer appointed by the mayor may be removed by him at pleasure. All city officers whose offices may be hereafter created by law, shall be chosen by the electors of the city or some district or division thereof, or appointed by the city authorities, as the Legislature may direct.

Mr. CURTIS—I see that in the second section provision is made that "all city officers for whose election or appointment no provision is made by existing laws, or in this article, shall be elected by the voters of the city at large," etc. I therefore move to strike out this eighth section.

The PRESIDENT—There being no motion to amend, that motion will be entertained.

Mr. DALY—I simply wish to say that this section, as it now stands, embodies exactly what we wish in the city of New York; and we shall regard the vote upon this section as a disposition of the whole subject, and upon this motion I ask the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. DUGANNE—I should like to have a division of that question, sir. I am decidedly in favor of the appointment by the mayor of heads of all subordinate departments. I believe that that power should be vested in the mayor, and that we should be rid in the city of New York of the conflict of jurisdiction, the opposition of one department to another, which has been the curse of that city as long as I can remember. I, therefore, Mr. President, would like to see this question divided.

Mr. VEEDER—I rise to a point of order—that the motion to strike out is not divisible.

The PRESIDENT—A motion to strike out and insert is not divisible, but if a motion is made to strike out a section a motion to amend it will take precedence.

Mr. VEEDER — I submit that a motion to strike out a section is not in order until it has been perfected.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair distinctly announced before the motion to strike out was entertained, that he would entertain any motion to amend.

Mr. DUGANNE—Does the Chair rule that I am not in order?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that if the gentleman from Kings desires to offer an amendment to this section, that takes precedence of the motion to strike out.

Mr. VEEDER—I do, sir.

Mr. DUGANNE — Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman is too late.

Mr. DUGANNE—I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understood the gentleman to be speaking on a motion to strike out.

Mr. VEEDER—He asked for a division of that question.

Mr. DUGANNE—I do not think that a motion to amend can be made while I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] rose to a point of order, which the Chair decided to be well taken; that is that he had a right to amend this section before it could be stricken out.

Mr. DUGANNE—Had I not a right to propose an amendment?

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman would have had the right if he had exercised it.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DUGANNE—I was about to exercise it.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] has exercised it. The proposition of the gentleman from Kings will be received.

Mr. VEEDER—I move to amend this section by striking out, in the eighth and ninth lines, the words "or some district or division thereof." I do not, perhaps, fully understand the intention of the Convention, and perhaps it may be that a majority of this Convention desire to retain this section. If that is true, sir, I think it important that these words should be stricken out, because it will be observed by the Convention that it provides here that city officers, to fill city offices that may be hereafter created by law, shall be chosen by the electors of the city, or some district or division thereof, or appointed. Now, sir, if the Legislature enact a law providing for the election of city officers, this section gives them the power to determine that the electors of a certain portion of the city can choose such city officers, to the exclusion of the electors of the remaining portion of the city, or, in other words, any city officer who may be elected in the city of New York or Brooklyn, or any other city, the Legislature may provide that that city officer may be chosen by a portion of the electors of such city.

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? If the amendment he proposes should be adopted, is it not clear that the election of our aldermen or common councilmen would have to be by the whole people? In attempting to avoid one error, does he not find himself in a dilemma in the opposite direction? This was intended to allow of the election of an alderman, or common councilman, or other officer, by a single district; and if the amendment is adopted, every officer of the city would have to be elected by the whole city.

Mr. VEEDER—I do not so understand the section, but, on the contrary, the object of my amendment is to provide against the Legislature singling out some district that may be antagonistic to the majority of the city in politics, and providing for the election of city officers by a portion of the electors. We have had instances of that kind. We have had wards divided up, and subdivided, so as to prohibit the electors of the city, or the majority of the people, expressing their choice, and to permitting the minority to elect the officers.

Mr. ALVORD—I do not know, under the rule, that it is germane, but I move to amend the section by striking out all after the word "pleasure" in the sixth line.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair does not think that germane to the motion of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder].

Mr. DUGANNE—I find in referring to the second section already adopted, a clause providing that "all city officers for whose election or appointment no provision is made by existing laws or in this article, shall be elected by the voters of the city at large, or of some division thereof, or appointed by the mayor with the consent of the board of aldermen, as shall be provided by law," which covers the point. I find that in the other section.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Veeder, and it was declared lost.

Mr. ALVORD—I move to amend the section by striking out the seventh, eighth, ninth and tenth lines, as follows:

"All city officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be chosen by the electors of the city or some district or division thereof, or appointed by the city authorities, as the Legislature may direct."

Mr. VEEDER—I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Alvord, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move to amend by inserting in line seven after the word "officers" the words "whose election or appointment is not provided for in this article," or so that it will read "all city officers whose election or appointment is not provided for in this article, or whose offices may hereafter be created by law," etc.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be upon the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 51 to 25.

The question recurred on striking out the section.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I hope this section will be stricken out. I do not believe in one-man power. I do not admire the system of government adopted in France so eulogized by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] this morning. I do not—

Mr. DALY—I beg to correct the gentleman. I did not eulogize the government of France, and God forbid I ever should eulogize the government of France.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Well, he admired the government of the city of Paris.

Mr. DALY—I did not eulogize the government of the city of Paris. I merely said that the mayor of Paris had more power than the mayor of New York.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I wish to speak well of the action of every committee of this Convention; but I wish to say at this time—and I do deliberately say—that this article is drawn with a profound admiration of the government of France, and in sympathy with the idea that the people shall elect one man, and that that one man when elected, shall have absolute power. Now, it may be said that I am doing injustice to the article. The people of France were allowed to elect the present Emperor by popular election. They did so elect him, and from that time the people of France have had no power whatever, and never will have so long as God in his wrath shall spare the life of that man. [Laughter.] I do not believe that it is necessary for the well-being of the cities of this State that the man who happens for the moment to obtain the office of mayor should have the appointment of every officer in the city; and, if he be of a stripe such as a certain man was who held the office of mayor in an important city in this State, have the power of selling—I speak advisedly when I say it—have the power of selling every office in the city. This is not my opinion of popular government. I have heard long and most touching sermons upon the right of self-government, and I have heard them preached in the interest of the report of the majority of this committee. But I tell the Convention and the gentlemen who concurred in the report of the majority of this committee, that when you look at the text of the majority report you will find none of the elements of popular government in it, except in so far as gentlemen may believe that the government of France is to-day a strictly popular government. Here are to be mayors who are to hold their office for three years; and they are to appoint every executive officer in the city; they are to appoint all the heads of departments. There is a perfect inconsistency in this section with what we have done already. We have provided that the comptroller of the city who is at the head of the department of finance shall be elected by the electors of the city. How can we adopt in this section a provision that the same officer that we have already decreed shall be elected by the electors of the city, shall be appointed by the mayor of the city? We have a good many cities in this State, and I believe in no city in this State, except, perhaps, in the city of New York, is there any desire that all power shall be intrusted to one man. If this be democracy (for we have heard a great deal about that and democratic government) if this be democracy, then the democratic fathers that I have ever followed, and follow to-day, were not democrats.

Mr. DALY—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Does his principle change when the Governor is the one man, instead of the mayor?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Yes—I said yes, but I will say no, for at the instant I did not understand the question. I spoke too quick, as I often do. No, sir, not at all. Why, I refused to intrust the power of appointing the heads of the departments of State to the Governor. And my friend, [Mr. Daly] will remember that when it was proposed in this Convention, in admiration of this same one-man power, to allow the Governor to appoint all the heads of departments in the State, I voted against it; and I am happy to say that the wisdom of this Convention frowned upon it and put the idea down. And when many gentlemen wanted the same exercise of power to be sanctioned in some form, when it was advocated by seven gentlemen in succession before any body else said one word upon the subject, that the Attorney-General must owe his appointment to the Governor, I ventured to stem the flood so far as my feeble efforts could do it, and it turned out that the good sense of the Convention not only would not allow the Governor to appoint the heads of departments, but would not allow him even to appoint the head of the law department, and I trust it will not be done here in this instance.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. Axtell it was declared carried.

The question recurred on striking out the eighth section, upon which the ayes and noes had been ordered.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll.

The name of Mr. Bickford was called.

Mr. BICKFORD—I desire to be excused from voting, having paired off with Mr. Ferry.

There being no objection, the gentleman was excused.

The name of Mr. Conger was called.

Mr. CONGER—I ask to be excused from voting, having paired off with my colleague—an arrangement which is to continue during the whole of the discussion of this article.

There being no objection, the gentleman was excused.

The SECRETARY concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I beg leave to withdraw my vote, as I had forgotten that I had paired off a short time since.

There being no objection, the vote was withdrawn.

The proposition to strike out was then declared carried by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Alvord, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Beckwith, Bell, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Cheritree, Clarke, Corbett, Curtis, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Endress, Field, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Frank, Gould, Graves, Hadley, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Kinney, Landon, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Lee, Miller, Murphy, Opdyke, C. E. Parker, Pond, President, Prindle, Prosser, Reynolds, Root, Rumsey, Schumaker, Seaver, Silvester, Smith, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—59.

Noes—Messrs. Barto, Bergen, E. Brooks, Cassidy, Colahan, Comstock, Cooke, Corning, Daly, Flagler, Garvin, Gross, Hale, Hardenburgh, Harris, Larremore, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Loew, Masten, Mattice, McDonald, Morris, Potter, Rogers, Roy, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen, Veeder, Verplanck, Wickham—32.

The SECRETARY read the next section as follows:

SEC. 9. Justices of the peace, police justices, and all other justices of inferior courts not of record, shall be elected by the electors of the city or such district or division thereof as shall be prescribed by law. Their term of office shall be four years. Their number and classification may be regulated by law. In case of a vacancy occurring before the expiration of a full term, such vacancy may be filled by election, but only for the residue of the unexpired term. Any such justice may be removed by such court as may be prescribed by law, but only after due notice and an opportunity of being heard in defense, and for causes to be assigned in the order of removal.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to strike out this section.

The PRESIDENT—If no amendment is offered the motion will be entertained.

Mr. FOLGER—If my recollection serves me, the same provision, or a provision tantamount to this, is contained in the article on the judiciary. I think it is amply provided for there.

Digitized by Google

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to inquire whether the article on the judiciary was not limited to justices of the peace, and whether it refers to police justices and all other justices of cities?

Mr. FOLGER—My impression is, it covers the case of police justices, justices of the peace, and justices of cities.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. Folger to strike out the section, it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 10. The State, for the purposes of local government, shall be divided into counties, towns, cities and villages, as heretofore, and no other local divisions or districts shall be made, nor shall any territory be annexed to a city, except for the purpose of changing its boundaries. All existing laws inconsistent with the provisions of this section shall become inoperative upon the adoption of this Constitution.

Mr. LAPHAM—I would suggest that it would be best to pass over this, as we have already adopted a section in its place.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair is not aware that the section in this form has been acted upon.

Mr. LAPHAM—This was the section; but it was taken up and modified.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understood it to be section 10 of the minority report of Mr. Opdyke, of New York.

Mr. LAPHAM—I move to strike out the section.

Mr. VEEDER—I call for the ayes and noes.

The PRESIDENT—Is there any motion to amend the section? No amendment being offered, the question is upon the motion to strike it out.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope that motion will not prevail, and that this section will not be stricken out. I think I am not mistaken in saying that no member of this Convention has yet attempted to give a reason why new local divisions of the State should be created. Whatever power we may choose to leave in the Legislature over cities—in whatever manner we think cities should be governed—no reason has yet been given by any one why new civil divisions of the State should be created, and we all know how it may be liable to great abuses. I hope the section, therefore, will not be stricken out.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I hope the section will be stricken out for this reason, if for no other. It is utterly impracticable to carry on the State government as it has been been carried on, irrespective of matters to which certain gentlemen object during the discussion, if this section is retained. The adoption of this section would prevent the creation of a ward in a village or a city. It would be impossible to have trustees of villages, or aldermen or assistant aldermen of cities, elected by local divisions in the cities The whole idea of village and city government must necessarily be overturned here, and all the officers would have to be elected by the entire village or city. There is another thing. A part of the government of this State is by school-districts. They have the power of taxation, which is an important function of government; and this would prevent entirely the creation of a school-district, with the right to exercise any power in governing the State. Governmental powers are also exercised by road districts, and a great variety of other districts. I repeat, this section is fraught with evil from beginning to end.

Mr. AXTELL—As no argument has been introduced and no reason has been "attempted to" be given why such districts should be created, as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has intimated, I think it would be useless to attempt further argument, at this stage of the proceedings at any rate, and I therefore move the previous question.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, it was declared carried.

The question being put on seconding the demand by Mr. Veeder, for the ayes and noes, a sufficient number seconded the call, and they were ordered.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Lapham to strike out the section.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll.

The name of Mr. Bickford was called.

Mr. BICKFORD—I desire to be excused, having paired.

There being no objection, the gentleman was excused.

The SECRETARY concluded the call of the roll on the motion to strike out the section, and it was declared carried by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Beckwith, Bell, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Cheritree, Clarke, Corbett, Curtis, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Endress, Field, Flagler, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Frank, Gould, Hadley, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Ketchum, Kinney, Landon, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Lee, McDonald, Miller, Opdyke, C. E. Parker, Pond, President, Prindle, Prosser, Reynolds, Root, Rumsey, Seaver, Silvester, Smith, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, Wakeman, Williams—57.

Noes—Messrs. Alvord, Baker, Barto, Bergen, E. Brooks, Cassidy, Colahan, Comstock, Cooke, Corning, Daly, Garvin, Graves, Gross, Harris, Hatch, Larremore, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Loew, Masten, Mattice, Morris, Murphy, Potter, Rogers, Roy, Schumaker, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen, Veeder, Verplanck, Wales, Wickham—35.

The SECRETARY read the eleventh section, as follows:

SEC. 11. The Legislature, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall pass such laws as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of this article. General laws shall also be passed for the organization and government of cities, and no special act shall be passed except in cases where, in the judgment of the Legislature, the object of such act cannot be attained under general laws.

No amendments being offered, the SECRETARY read the twelfth section, as follows:

SEC. 12 The board of supervisors of New York is abolished, and the duties of such board shall be performed by the mayor and common council, as the Legislature may direct.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ALVORD—Gentlemen by turning to the article on the powers and duties of the Legislature, will find that we have provided that a board of supervisors shall be elected in each of the counties of the State, except in the city and county of New York. That provision renders this entirely unnecessary, and I move that it be stricken out.

Mr. OPDYKE—I believe, sir, that under that provision of the Constitution the Legislature would have the right to create a board of supervisors in the county of New York. Experience has shown that that board is altogether unnecessary, and that it adds greatly to the expenses of the city. I think, therefore, that we had better declare constitutionally, that the board is abolished, because all parties are satisfied that its services are unnecessary, and that it adds greatly to the cost of our local government. I hope, therefore, that the motion to strike out the section under consideration will not prevail.

Mr. GARVIN—I am entirely opposed to the section remaining in this article. I concur entirely with the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] in the motion which he makes to strike it out. I am a little surprised that my friend from New York [Mr. Opdyke], whom I esteem very highly, should take the position he does in reference to this particular section, for he himself must well recollect that in the darkest period of the war, immediately after the riots in our city, when the flag of our country was trailing in the dust, and we were looking around to find an organization that would best promote the great object we had in view to put men into the field for the purpose of putting down the rebellion, he most anxiously consulted not only with his own political friends but also with those who are associated with me, as to the best mode in which that could be done. We found ourselves hampered in every direction. We had no act of the Legislature, we had no general power or authority in the city or county of New York by which we could act, and we found it a most difficult thing to obtain volunteers at that time. The board of supervisors was fixed upon as the best organization that could be selected for the purpose of effectuating the object we had in view. They assembled, a committee was appointed, of which my friend, being then mayor of the city, was made an honorary member, and an ordinance which was drawn in the office which I then occupied, by the present able and popular city chamberlain, was passed and put into effect, without the shadow of justification in law; and under that ordinance nine millions of dollars were raised, and one hundred and sixteen thousand men put in the field; and all that was done not only with the approbation of my friend the then mayor [Mr. Opdyke], but by his most vigorous, strenuous and energetic efforts. Associated with him was one whose name every gentleman in this Convention will recollect—our old friend Elijah F. Purdy—now gone to his long and, I trust, happy account. With him also were associated William M. Tweed, Orison Blunt and Comptroller Brennan. Mr. Tweed is now a member of the Senate of this State, elected by a majority of twelve to fifteen thousand votes over his republican competitors. These were the men who were on the committee associated with my friend from New York [Mr. Opdyke]. These were the men that put those soldiers into the field. These were the men that in that way aided the loyal forces of our country in putting down that rebellion against the best government on the face of the earth. And now when we are here for the purpose of making an organic law it is proposed to strike this organization, this board of supervisors, out of existence. Why should it be done? What do we propose to put in place of it? By this very section they propose to confer the powers of the board upon the board of aldermen. Why confer county powers on city officers? Why put all the county property, which my friend knows to be large, in the city of New York, and all the county interests into the hands of the board of aldermen, whose particular and proper duties are to administer the affairs of the city and nothing more? Under this provision they will be meeting one hour as a board of aldermen, and the next hour as a board of supervisors, the same men mixing city and county matters together and turning them over and over. Why, sir, one of the principal theories of our system of government is a division of responsibility and power. Let there be two boards. Let one take care of the county interests, and the other take care of the city interests. Thus the danger of confusion is avoided. I hope and trust this section will be stricken out, not only for the reason suggested by my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] that it has been already passed upon, but because this board of supervisors should remain. If the Legislature at any time see fit to abolish the board of supervisors, and it turns out that its abolition does not work well, and that it is necessary that they should be restored, it can be done. But if you insert a provision in the Constitution saying that there shall be no board of supervisors in the city and county of New York, and if this Constitution be adopted, for twenty years to come, you cannot have a board of this description in that county, no matter what exigency may arise. I trust, Mr. President, that whatever gentlemen may have done in reference to commissions, whatever they may do in reference to sanitary matters, whether you leave these subjects in the hands of the Legislature as now or not, you will leave to us this organization. I know we are in the hands of our adversaries, and if we are to be deprived of all our rights, we shall retire fighting to the end; we have been here together for more than six months, and we understand each other, and I trust that gentlemen will not deny us this one of our just rights. Let us have this if you give us nothing else.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. GARVIN—I say to my friend from Troy [Mr. M. I. Townsend], whom I have known for many years, that I now resign the floor to him, because I know that he must make a speech or die. [Laughter].

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I asked the gentleman to yield, not that I might make a speech, but simply to ask a question. I want to know if this Tweed that he speaks of is the same one that we read of in the newspapers? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARVIN—Mr. Tweed is a man who was loyal during the war, a man who went for the gentleman's [Mr. M. I. Townsend's] idea of putting down the rebellion, and he is the same man that "we read of in the newspapers," a man who submitted his claims to the people of his district, and who was elected by a majority of twelve thousand. I want to know if the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] was ever elected by such a majority as that?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I am answered. I never ran but once.

Mr. GARVIN—And never will again. [Laughter.]

Mr. OPDYKE—As my esteemed friend from New York [Mr. Garvin] has made personal allusions to myself, I hope the Chair and the Convention will indulge me while I say a few words in reply. In the first place, sir, it affords me great pleasure to confirm what the gentleman has said of the action of the board of supervisors of New York during the trying period of the war; and I concur in his marked commendation of the late Elijah F. Purdy, whose co-operation I requested and received at that time. The first action that the board of supervisors took after the riot was to take in hand a matter that the common council had acted upon in a manner which I had failed to approve. The common council had proposed to appropriate three millions of dollars of the funds of the city to pay the commutation of drafted men, which would have prevented the government from getting any men from the city of New York under that draft. As I have said, I did not approve of that measure. The board of supervisors, under the leadership of Mr. Purdy, took the matter in hand, and by the expenditure of a little over half a million dollars, satisfied all the requirements of the draft, and gave the United States government two thousand men, thus saving to the city two millions and a half of dollars by a single act, saving, at the same time, the honor of the city, and strengthening the hands of the government. That system the board of supervisors continued, with great fidelity and usefulness to the city, and, in my judgment, they saved the city and county not less than ten millions of dollars during the war. This much is due in acknowledgement of the services of that board. I wish that I could approve of all the things they have done, but I think they have, like some other men in office, sometimes departed widely from the public interests. However, I shall not refer to such matters now. But I will say here that whatever of personal virtues and aptitude for business they may possess, will be very likely to be transferred to the other Legislative body of the city, and that we shall then have the use of their services still. What I am opposed to is in having two independent legislative bodies, whose jurisdictions are co-extensive, the boundaries of the county and the boundaries of the city being identical. It is only since the year 1857 that we have had more than one local legislative authority to govern that territory. Prior to that time, the duties pertaining to the county organization were performed by the mayor, recorder and board of aldermen. Those duties can be performed in that way still, and I think they had better be thus performed. My friend appeals to us, saying that we have stricken down every other right appertaining to the city of New York, and that we must not take from it this also. So far as regards the board of supervisors, we stand politically upon equal ground. It is a non-partisan body, made up of half of one party and half of the other, and none of my democratic colleagues have objected to the board on that ground. While I am willing to do all justice to the board of supervisors, the question for us to decide is, whether the city will be governed better without it than with it, and on that point I have not the slightest doubt.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Admitting, sir, that the rural population of the island of New York is almost entirely absorbed by the power of the municipality of the city, I still am in favor of retaining in our Constitution a recognition of the board of supervisors. I am in favor of it on general principles. Why should the county of New York be made an exception? There are some seventeen other counties that have cities in them, as well as the county of New York, though perhaps not so large cities. Why, I ask, should that county be made an exception? Besides, there may be times, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Garvin] has very well illustrated, when a conservative body might come in with their assistance and do a great deal of good by assuming, or at least sharing, a grave responsibility with other powers within the county. Again, sir, in the changes and revolutions that may take place hereafter—an event of this kind may occur—a better tone of sentiment may exist in the State as to the propriety of leaving matters that are strictly local with the localities, and thereby the duties of the State Legislature may be greatly lessened. Then, perhaps, a deputation may be sent from each board of supervisors to transact what little business there will remain for the Legislature, especially if we adopt that great, salutary, restraining principle, as a check upon careless legislation, of the Constitution of 1777, and make the Senate a board of council and revision, and thus have really but one purely legislative body, and that drawn from boards exercising subordinate but analogous powes in the counties. But, sir, however that may be, on general principles, I object to this change. I object to singling out the county of New York from the other counties of the State, and making it an exception. I had frequent occasion, years ago, when I partly represented the city of New York in the Legislature, to complain even then, and at times, of my own political friends, that demands were made for special and exceptional acts in reference to the city of New York. I told those who sought those acts then, that they would be returned on them at some time with interest. The people of that city have now to come up here, from year to year, begging the Legislature that they may be permitted to tax themselves. The comptroller of New York city is now in Albany on a humiliating mission of this nature. Sir, that is all wrong; it is contrary to the principles of our government. Some gentlemen give as a reason for this exceptional legislation that the population of that city is exceptional; that it has a greater proportion of ignorance and crime than other parts of the State. Sir, we hear very little said here about the intelligence, very little about the virtue, of the city of New York. We have had very little said about the fact (it was only alluded to by Mr. Develin last evening that some of the incipient steps of the Revolution took place in the city of New York; and as allusion has been made to the throwing overboard of the tea in Boston harbor, if the gentleman will look at the history of these States they will find that Captain Sears led a party which threw overboard tea in the harbor of New York, even at an earlier period than it was done in Boston. They will find, too, the fact that when the Asia man-of-war "fired upon the town" it was because the people were spiking the guns upon the Battery in anticipation of the events that were soon to come. As almost a native of New York, all my family, except myself, having been born there, and it is the city of my adoption since three or four weeks from my nativity, and having thus adopted it, as my native place (laughter), I claim that it had a great deal to do with the creation of our national existence, and that it was most potential in reference to matters connected with our State government. Some gentlemen here may not be aware of another fact connected with our revolutionary history, which I, in the course of reading, have discovered — that the men who were nominated and selected in the city of New York to go to Philadelphia at the time the Declaration of Independence was made were instructed to make that Declaration. The men that were first selected were required by the people to pledge themselves to do that. They threw themselves on their reserved rights and said "no," we will not go under any pledge. So the people of New York city named other gentlemen, and the signers of the Declaration of Independence from the colony of New York were the delegates chosen on the second occasion, and at the instance of that city alone. But, sir, I will not go any further into the history of that city at this time, except to assert her leading position in the events of those stirring days. To return briefly to the matter of the relative morality of cities. My respected friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] has stated here that the intrusion of the "roughs" of New York into the city of Troy was one of the causes for the creation of the capital police.

The PRESIDENT—Will the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] pardon the Chair for saying that he thinks the gentleman is slightly wandering? [Laughter.]

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Well, sir, allow me to finish the sentence. I wish to say to my friend that the idea of "roughs" (in politics) was first suggested by the pipe-layers of Philadelphia, and who defeated my own election in 1838, by an "intrusion" as passengers, on Captain Schultz's Amboy steamer, of some four hundred ruffians, who, under the management of corrupt leading whig politicians, some of whom are living to-day —I trust to regret their connection with the matter—(which periled in 1840 their personal liberty, in the nearly successful effort that was made by the courts of New York city to bring the rigor of our statutes to bear upon them)— were then made to "vote early and often," and at as many polls as possible, and to thus defeat the admitted democratic majority of the city.

Mr. ALVORD—I made the motion to strike out for the reason that this is only repeating what we have already done. If gentlemen will look at document No. 83, on the report of the committee on town officers, etc., adopted and sent to the Committee on Revision, they will find in section 3 a provision that, "there shall be in each of the counties of this State, except New York, a board of supervisors, elected," etc. That is why I have made this motion. I wish to say a few words—

Mr. GRAVES—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALVORD—Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAVES—You have provided for the establishment of a board of supervisors in each county of the State, except New York?

Mr. ALVORD—Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAVES—Now, what body have you clothed with the powers that were formerly exercised by the board of supervisors in New York?

Mr. ALVORD—That subject is left to the Legislature. I desire to say in this connection that I wish it to be understood that, I have made this motion, not because I am in favor of the view of the gentleman in front of me [Mr. Garvin], but because I believe this board to be entirely unnecessary.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Will my friend from Onondaga allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALVORD—I will, sir.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The article to which the gentleman refers as adopted by the Convention, does not prohibit a board of supervisors in the city of New York, but simply provides for the creation of such boards in other counties. Now, may it not be construed by the courts, that, the board of supervisors being already in existence in the county of New York, it will stand and continue, and is not constitutionalized out of existence by that article?

Mr. ALVORD—I have no fear at all in that regard. I want to know if the present boards of supervisors in the other counties of this State are recognized by the present Constitution. They are simply the result of legislative enactments. We go on here and specify in terms that hereafter so far as regards that particular class of local officers, they shall exist in each county of the State except the county of New York; and therefore, in that exception, we prohibit the existence of a board of supervisors in the county of New York, and by no possibility can the Legislature create such a board there unless we strike out that exception.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell for the previous question, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Alvord, to strike out the twelfth section, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the thirteenth section, as follows:

SEC. 13. All city elections shall be held on the second Tuesday in April, and the official year shall begin on the first day of May.

Mr. AXTELL—I move to strike out this section.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the fourteenth section as follows:

SEC. 14. The Legislature, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall provide for the appointment of three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to reduce into a systematic code, the laws of this State, relating to the government of cities, with such alterations and amendments thereto as to them shall seem practicable and expedient. They shall report their proceedings to the Legislature for its action thereon.

Mr. RUMSEY—I am against putting commissions into the Constitution in any form. I therefore move to strike out that section.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope that section will not be stricken out, because I think it a very useful section to retain. There is nothing that so much needs codifying and revising as the laws of our State in regard to the charters of cities. If any one will look over a volume of the Session Laws he will find that it is at least half filled with city and village charters and amendments of them. Special laws of this kind fill the volumes of our legislation. I think that great body of special laws may be reduced into some uniform code, which will simplify it, and which will prevent much special legislation hereafter. Under this impression I incline to hope that this section may be retained.

Mr. POND—I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] whether if this section is retained this commission may not make alterations in the government of cities, and the Legislature have authority to adopt them, although not consistent with this Constitution?

Mr. COMSTOCK—No; the work must be done within the Constitution.

Mr. POND—The section does not say so.

Mr. COMSTOCK—No matter, it need not say so. Of course the commissions must act within the Constitution.

Mr. LAPHAM—I am in favor of striking this out for two reasons. In the first place, we have provided in section 11 for the passage of general laws for the organization of city governments, and have provided that no special legislation shall be had, except where, in the opinion of the Legislature, the object cannot be attained by general laws. This contemplates a reorganization of the laws in relation to cities. The commission provided by this section is wholly unnecessary, and it would involve a vast expense to the State, because within the scope of the section are all the charters of the various cities of the State and all the special acts amendatory of those charters, which necessarily would be included within the codification that is here provided for, and the amount of matter that would enter into this code of laws would be larger, much larger, than that which enters into the code which was made by the commission appointed some years ago to codify the general statutes of the State. For these reasons I am opposed to any such provision as this, and I hope the section will be stricken out.

Mr. CURTIS—It does not seem to me a matter of very great importance, but it is clear that this section is mandatory, and that the work which is sought to be done by this commission will be of undoubted value to the State. I trust, therefore, that the section will be retained.

Mr. FRANCIS—I move as an amendment to the section the language of the Constitution of 1846, eighth article, section 9—"It shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities and to restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts and loaning their credit, so as to prevent abuses in assessments and in contracting debts by such municipal corporations."

Mr. COMSTOCK—I do not think that that amendment is germane to this section.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will inform the gentleman from Onondaga that under the rule adopted by the Convention, it is simply required that one amendment shall be germane to another amendment.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I suggest to the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] that his amendment would be more appropriate to the fifteenth than to the fourteenth section.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Francis and it was declared lost.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] to strike out the section.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell for the previous question, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Rumsey to strike out the fourteenth section, and, on a division, it was declared carried, ayes 47, noes 28.

Mr. FRANCIS—Would it be in order to move an amendment to the fifteenth section such as I moved to the fourteenth section?

The PRESIDENT—It will be in order after the Secretary shall have read the fifteenth section.

The SECRETARY read the fifteenth section, as follows:

SEC. 15. Every city shall determine the amount to be raised by tax therein for city purposes, including police and sanitary expenses, but no money shall be so raised for any purpose not previously authorized by law.

Mr. FRANCIS—I move as a substitute for this section the provision of the Constitution of 1846 which I have already indicated, and which is as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities, and to restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts and loaning their credit, so as to prevent abuses in assessments, and in contracting debts by such municipal corporations."

Mr. VEEDER—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. VEEDER—This subject-matter has been submitted to the Convention already, and voted upon, and the only way that the gentleman can reach it is by a motion to reconsider.

Digitized by Google

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understands the gentleman from Rensselaer, to offer this as a substitute for the fifteenth section.

Mr. VEEDER—He offered the same proposition as an amendment to another section; and if a proposition can be offered in this Convention as an amendment to one section and then be renewed as an amendment to every other section as it comes up, I desire to know that fact. I desire to know if it is parliamentary. A ruling has been had the other way heretofore, and I simply desire to know what is the ruling now.

Mr. FRANCIS—The chief objection, as I understand it, to the amendment offered by me to the fourteenth section, was that it was not germane to that section—that I did not offer it in the proper place.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair thinks that the proposition of the gentleman from Rensselaer, to strike out the fifteenth section, and to insert new matter in its place, is a different proposition from a proposition to amend another section. The motion of the gentleman from Rensselaer, now, is to strike out one thing and to insert another in its stead; and that was not his former motion.

Mr. MURPHY—The substitute or section which is proposed by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] is identical with the provision in the present Constitution. Having been the author of that provision in the existing Constitution, I beg to say something in reference to it, and to state the reason why I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Rensselaer. In the Convention of 1846 a struggle was made in vain to incorporate into that instrument a requirement that there should be an organization of cities by general law. Public opinion was not then ripe for such a provision, and after discussing the subject, the Convention finally determined that they would pass it over, but, in order to do something, they recommended to the Legislature the adoption of the section as it is. Now there are two objections to re-incorporating it in the proposed Constitution as suggested by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis]. The first is that we have already provided in the Constitution for the organization of cities by general law; and the other is, that although this provision has now been in our Constitution for twenty years, the Legislature have altogether failed to act under it, looking upon it as an instruction, and not a mandate; and if you adopt it here now, there will be no further action upon it than heretofore. I am opposed to striking out the section as reported by the majority of the committee. The Convention are undoubtedly aware that under the existing law all the cities of the State, with the exception of the city of New York, determine the amount of money which they want for city purposes. The Legislature, by general enactment, has provided for the circumstances of the different cities of the State with the exception of the city of New York. That city has been an exception from the foundation of the government, and when it did not contain more than 20,000 or 30,000 inhabitants the same rule prevailed in regard to it that prevails now. It is not because the city of New York is so large and has such great interests, that the rule has been continued requiring that it shall come to the Legislature every year for the passage of a tax levy; but that rule has been continued in pursuance of an old custom—there being no power in the old charter of the city. Now, there is no more necessity that the city of New York should submit to the inconvenience of going annually to the Legislature, than that any other city of a like, or a large population should do so. I have seen in my experience that this rule is a source of great wrong and injury to the city of New York. The corporate authorities there make up their estimate of what is necessary for the purpose of carrying on the city government; and I believe that as a general rule those estimates have been fairly and judiciously made. But it is requisite that the estimate shall be brought up to the Legislature and passed upon there, before the tax can be levied. What is the consequence? When the estimate gets to Albany other interests come in, and appropriations for other objects than those contemplated by the authorities are put in, sometimes for large sums; and the strife as has almost uniformly for the last six years arisen from this bill in the Legislature, is absolutely frightful. I do not see, Mr. President why we might not leave to the city of New York, under a legislative provision, or a constitutional provision, if you please, the entire question of determining how much money is needed for its own purposes. Of course they cannot appropriate or spend under this section any moneys except such as shall be previously authorized by enactments of the Legislature. I hope, therefore, that the section will be retained, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] will not be adopted.

Mr. FRANCIS—I support this substitute because it is a declaration of a just constitutional policy which provides for the organization of cities, and which proposes to restrict their power of taxation, assessments, etc. My objection to the fifteenth section, as reported by the committee, is that it places those great interests of police and sanitary organization completely under the control of the municipal authorities in the mattert of voting appropriations for their support—that it places the boards in the hands of this municipal power, so that it may impair and utterly destroy their efficiency. The section reported by the committee seems to me to be entirely in conflict with the principles and policy which have been supported by the votes of this Convention; whereas the proposition I have submitted as a substitute is the announcement of a correct and proper principle and policy, and I think may rightly have a place in the Constitution.

Mr. OPDYKE—I hope the substitute offered by my friend from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] with slight amendment, will be adopted. I rise to propose one amendment and to suggest another. I move to insert after the word "provide" these words "by general laws, as provided for in this article;" so that it will read, "it shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide by general laws, as provided for in this article, for the organization of cities," etc.

Digitized by Google

Mr. FRANCIS—I accept that amendment.

Mr. OPDYKE—I offer that amendment in the hope of getting rid of much of this special legislation to which we in the city of New York have been subjected, and which has often been of an injurious character. That having been accepted, I now propose another; to add at the end of the substitute the following: "The Legislature shall not have power to make additions to the tax levies of cities." We have found in the city of New York from year to year a growing disposition in the Legislature to make large additions to our tax levies, additions, many of which where unnecessary, injudicious and improper. I am willing the Legislature should have power to correct and reduce whenever they find improper items in the tax levy, but I am utterly opposed to giving them any power to make additions. It is to be presumed that the local authorities know what they need and will put in all that is necessary. It is possible and even probable that they will put in some things that should not be there and I would give the Legislature power to strike those things out; but I can see no propriety in giving them power to make additions to the tax levy.

Mr. FRANCIS—I accept that amendment.

Mr. DUGANNE—I am very glad that the gentleman has offered that amendment. I had already prepared something of that kind the final clause of which I should like to have adopted as an amendment to the gentleman's proposition. I would like to amend by adding at the end of the amendment of the gentleman [Mr. Opdyke] the words, "without consent of the proper authorities." On further consideration and from the suggestion of my friend from New York [Mr. Opdyke], I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MURPHY—The objection to this amendment is that it is destroying the taxing power of the State in regard to cities. It is an actual prohibition of the taxing power of the State to do any thing except what the local authorities of cities consent to.

Mr. AXTELL—I call for the reading of the amendment of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis].

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities, and to restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts, and loaning their credit, so as to prevent abuses in assessments and in contracting debts by such municipal corporations: but the Legislature shall not have power to make additions to the tax levies of cities."

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question on the section.

Mr. ALVORD—I hope not. It seems to me that the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Axtell] stands there in his place, keeping the floor for the purpose of moving the previous question upon every thing.

Mr. AXTELL—I withdraw my motion for the previous question. I rise to a question of privilege. I believe I have not trespassed upon the rights of any gentleman upon this floor, and I think the remark of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] is entirely uncalled for.

Mr. ALVORD—It is a question between the gentleman and me. I say that he has been standing upon the floor for the last half hour waiting to make this motion.

Mr. LANDON—I rise to a question of order. The remarks of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] are not germane to any pending question.

Mr. ALVORD—I desire to say a few words upon the question which is now before the Convention. One of the grievances complained of by the people of the city of New York—and it is a very great grievance, so far as they are concerned, and a very great burden upon the Legislature—is the necessity of their annual tax levy coming up here for the purpose of being passed upon by the Legislature. There is no other city in the State that has to come up to the Legislature to have its annual tax levy approved, and this rule in regard to the city of New York has given rise to very great abuses. Parties opposed to some items in the tax levy that were really necessary have come up from the city, and succeeded in getting members of the Legislature to strike them out. Now, if we make general laws authorizing the Legislature to interfere with unnecessary and unlawful taxation, we should stop there. We should say in specific terms to every one of the cities of the State that they shall be treated as a whole by general laws in regard to this matter, and that the Legislature shall not undertake to interfere. The original proposition of the Committee on Cities was to do away with this matter of the city of New York coming up here with this annual tax levy. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis], or to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke], if he will go a little further, and not only prohibit the Legislature from adding to the tax levies of cities, but prohibit them from having any thing to do with the tax after it shall have been levied. Let us have a general law under which cities can regulate this matter themselves, and then if they violate the general law, let the matter be so fixed that the citizens can go into the courts to have it regulated. Let us do away with this coming up here to the Legislature with the tax levy after it has been passed upon by the local authorities of the city. I trust, sir, that this discrimination which has obtained in the past, so far as regards the city of New York, will not be continued under any constitutional provision which we may make on the subject, and I trust, therefore, the gentleman from New York will withdraw his amendment, and will agree to this one which I suggest: "But the Legislature shall not have power to alter a tax levy made in pursuance of general laws."

Mr. AXTELL—I rise to a personal explanation. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] says that I have been standing upon the floor for the last half hour ready to move the previous question. Sir, I had been standing upon the floor for a few minutes, before I made that motion; and I will say to that gentleman through the Chair, if the Chair please, that I sometimes am compelled to stand upon the floor from the fact that I cannot sit very long in one position. Inasmuch as it seems to hurt the gentleman's feelings to see me standing upon the floor, I think it is due to him that he should know this fact. I yield to the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger].

Mr. FOLGER—I wish to ask the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] why he leaves out the words "incorporated villages" from this amendment?

Mr. FRANCIS—At the suggestion of others, and because we are dealing with city matters.

Mr. FOLGER—It is quite as important, I think, there should be a general law for incorporated villages also.

Mr. DALY—In consequence of provisions in the old charters of the city of New York, it was thought at an earlier period that it was a doubtful matter under these charters, whether the city could lawfully impose a tax without the sanction of the Legislature, and so the practice has arisen of coming to the Legislature every year for this authority. The trouble now is, that, the practice having been established, all taxation to be imposed for the expenses of the city of New York has to go through the ordeal of the Legislature, and the Legislature may and do add to or take from the estimates of the local authorities. The amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] provides for this, and recognizes in that locality what is recognized in every other county in the State, that those who have to pay the taxes should regulate the raising of them, that that power should not be transferred from the locality to the central power of the State. In this particular, as in others, the city of New York is treated as an exception, and if, the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] should be adopted, then this consistent principle would be recognized and fixed by it, that, as the city of New York, for all the purposes of its local government, has to pay for that government, it, and not the State, ought to determine what sum of money shall be raised for such purposes, and how that money shall be applied. That is done now in every other county in the State, and there is no reason why there should be an exception made in respect to the city of New York.

Mr. W. C. BROWN—I hope this amendment will not prevail. If I understand it rightly it will require the Legislature of the State, the first year after the adoption of this Constitution, to pass a general code of law which shall, in and of itself, constitute the charter of every city now existing, and of every one that shall be organized hereafter; and there can be no special laws applicable to particular cities, and such as are required by the peculiar circumstances of particular cities. It seems to me that that plan is utterly impracticable. It is utterly impracticable for any legislature to devise a code which shall be applicable to the city of New York and at the same time shall constitute a proper charter for the city of Troy or the city of Oswego. In fact, I deem it utterly impracticable to make a charter that shall be a proper and sufficient charter for any two cities in the State; and if any gentleman here thinks that it is practicable I would remind him that the Legislature can attempt it and can do it without this constitutional provision; but my word for it, if they do, they will repeal the act by which they do it within a year. I hope that, by the rejection of this and the other amendments on the subject now before the Convention, the Legislature may be left to pass charters for particular cities, with reference to their particular local wants, and that there will be no attempt made to fix upon one city a charter that is fit only for another.

Mr. POND—This question that is now before us substantially involves two—one the striking out of the fifteenth section, and the other the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis]. Is the question capable of division?

The PRESIDENT—A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I ask leave to make a motion in the interest of the business of the Convention, and it is that before taking a recess to-day we proceed to finish the article under consideration.

The PRESIDENT—If there be no objection, that motion will be entertained.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. E. Brooks, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ALVORD—Do I understand the Chair that that motion is adopted?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair heard no objection.

Mr. ALVORD—I have been without my breakfast this morning, and I take dinner at two o'clock. I object. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT—The objection comes too late.

Mr. POND—It strikes me that this section 15 ought to be struck out or amended. It seems to have been framed upon the original plan of the committee, which plan has been entirely changed by the Convention, and it includes the power on the part of the State to determine the amount to be raised by tax for city purposes of every kind, including police and sanitary purposes. Now, it is very clear that, if this power be conferred upon the city authorities, they will be able to nullify entirely any police or sanitary law that the State may provide for the city. I therefore think that the section ought to be struck out entirely. So far as general laws are concerned, we have already provided for that, as far as it can be reached, in the eleventh section, which has been adopted. I hope, therefore, that whether the amendment of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] shall be adopted or not, this section 15 will be struck out, unless it is amended by striking out the words which include expenses for police and sanitary purposes. It seems to me that the whole section had better be stricken out, and the power left with the Legislature to regulate this subject according to what they may deem expedient.

Mr. VEEDER—There being no limit fixed for this debate, I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Veeder to adjourn, and it was declared lost.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Francis to strike out and substitute, and it was declared lost.

Digitized by Google

Mr. RUMSEY—Now, sir, I move to strike out the section.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Rumsey to strike out, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the sixteenth section, as follows:

SEC. 16. Nothing in this article contained shall affect the power of the Legislature in matters of quarantine, or relating to the port of New York, or the interest of the State in the lands under water and within the jurisdiction or boundaries of any city, or to regulate the wharves, piers, or slips in any city.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I wish to move a reconsideration of each section of this article that has been adopted by the Convention.

Mr. VEEDER—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the motion lies on the table, under the rule.

Mr. OPDYKE—I offer the following amendment:

"SEC. —. The restrictions on the power of the Legislature contained in section 12, of article —, of this Constitution, shall apply to common councils of cities, and to boards of supervisors of counties."

Mr. VERPLANCK—I would like to know what this means, and what it applies to. The gentleman does not even give the section.

Mr. OPDYKE—The section I refer to is contained in the report of the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature, and I will read it:

SEC. 12. The Legislature shall not grant any extra compensation to any public officer, servant, agent or contractor after the service shall have been rendered, or the contract entered into, nor increase or diminish the compensation of any public officer, agent, contractor or servant, except judicial officers, during his time of service.

Now, Mr. President, I offer this amendment as an additional section. It will be seen that we have provided that the legislative power of the State shall be thus restricted. Now, I maintain that it is important that we thus restrict legislative power in cities and counties. In the city of New York it has come to be one of the most serious evils, that of giving extra compensation to contractors. We have adopted a restriction in that regard in the Legislature which is most salutary, and I am sure it will be most salutary in the city of New York, and I think it would be most salutary everywhere.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Opdyke, and it was declared carried.

Mr. RUMSEY—The amendment which I proposed, declaring the effect of this article, was stricken out with the article. I move to add it at the end of section 2 as an amendment. It is a proposition that nothing in this article shall be construed to prevent the Legislature from abolishing any office in the city of New York except the mayor.

A DELEGATE—It was stricken out by order of the Convention, was it not?

Mr. RUMSEY—It was stricken out with the whole section. I offer it now as an amendment to the second section.

Mr. R. BROOKS—If I recollect aright, a separate vote was taken on that—it was a distinct question.

The PRESIDENT—The statement of the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BERGEN—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would ask the Chair what would be the effect of an adjournment now?

The PRESIDENT—The Convention would not meet again until to-morrow morning.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Bergen to adjourn, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 8 ayes—the noes not counted.

Mr. BERGEN—I call for a count on the other side, as I think there is no quorum present.

The question was again put on the motion of Mr. Bergen, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 18 to 61.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—It is said, Mr. President, that in olden times "criminals were hung that judges might dine." I do not suppose that it is the desire of three or four millions of people in this State that we should serve them in framing this Constitution at the expense of losing our dinners, and I move that we take the usual recess.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. S. Townsend, and, on a division, it was declared carried by a vote of 51 to 25.

So the Convention took a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock P. M.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Cities, their organization and powers.

The PRESIDENT announced amendments generally to be in order.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I move the following amendment:

"After the adoption of this Constitution the commissioners of the Niagara frontier police district shall be elected by the electors of that district, or appointed by such city officers elected by the electors of the city of Buffalo, as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose."

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Verplanck, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HADLEY—I move to amend the first section by inserting in the seventh line before the word "their" the words "them and," so that it will read, "And shall have power to investigate their acts, and have access to all books and documents in their respective offices, and to examine them and their subordinates under oath." The object of this amendment is this: that the mayor may have power to examine the heads of departments as well as their subordinates under oath. The section as it now reads is, that the mayor shall have the power to examine the subordinate officers. I desire to amend it so that he shall have the power to examine the heads of departments and their subordinates.

Digitized by Google

Mr. RUMSEY—It seems to me that that might be an infringement of a rule of law that has been well established, and long sustained, which entitles every man to exemption from examination as a witness against himself whenever he may be prosecuted criminally; and that this Convention ought to hesitate before they adopt a provision of that kind. If such a provision is adopted it should be coupled with the further provision that the evidence which the accused may give, should in no case be used for the purpose of prosecuting them criminally; and unless the amendment be offered in that way I should object seriously to the adoption of it.

Mr. HADLEY — I consent to modify the amendment in that way.

Mr. RUMSEY—Annex at the end of that sentence, "but no evidence taken on such examination shall be used in a criminal proceeding against the officers so removed."

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Civil or criminal.

Mr. RUMSEY—No; let it be simply "criminal" in the Constitution.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the amendment as follows:

"To insert after the word 'examine' in the sixth and seventh lines of the first section, the words 'them and;' and after the word 'oath,' the words, 'the evidence given by such officer shall not be used in any criminal proceeding against such officer.'"

Mr. ALVORD—I would like to ask the gentleman from Seneca [Mr. Hadley] and the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] whether that includes subordinates also?

Mr. RUMSEY—Yes, sir.

Mr. ALVORD—They may not be officers; they may be simply clerks.

Mr. RUMSEY—Put in at the end "all officers and their subordinates."

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—"Persons so testifying,"

Mr. RUMSEY—"Against persons so testifying," instead of "officers"—put it in that form.

The question was then put on the amendment offered by Mr. Hadley, as thus modified, and it was declared carried.

Mr. COMSTOCK — I believe general amendments are in order. I propose an amendment in what I understand to be the second section. It was the second section of Mr. Murphy's report, which I believe is substituted as the second section of the majority report, with some amendments. I call the attention of members of the Convention to the ninth line of that section, in which the words "by existing laws or" are interpolated. Those were inserted before the substitute was offered, and when the substitute was accepted those words were accepted with it. I move to strike them out, so that it will read "all city officers, for whose election or appointment no provision is made in this article, shall be elected by the voters of the city at large, or by some division thereof, or appointed by the mayor, with the consent of the board of aldermen, as shall be provided by law." Now, I am not aware that there is any city officer except those provided for by existing laws, or in this article of the Constitution, so that the first obvious remark upon the matter, as it now reads, is that it operates upon nothing whatever. I take it for granted that every officer in the city of New York holds according to an existing law, or according to this article of the Constitution, and will so hold. Therefore, there is nothing else for the provision to operate upon. In other words, the exception made is just as broad as the enactment itself. But a more material objection, I apprehend, is this, that it prevents the Legislature from interfering with the manner in which all the existing officers of the city are appointed or elected. There are now many officers in the city of New York, I suppose, who, under the legislation of the last few years, are not elected by the people of the city or appointed by any city authorities; and I suppose the true meaning of this interpolation is to prevent the Legislature forever from interfering with that class of officers. An exception is a prohibition, as every lawyer knows, in most cases. The plain English of this provision is that except officers provided for by existing laws or in this article, they shall be elected by the people of the city or appointed by city authority. In other words, all those officers who are provided for by existing laws or this article shall not be elected by the people or appointed by the city authorities. The Legislature hereafter can make no provision on that subject. The express exception here, I apprehend, will prevent legislative interference forever, and that probably was the design. I move to strike out the words.

Mr. LAPHAM—I propose an amendment which will obviate the difficulty, I think, and that is to amend the section so that it will read in this form, "All officers for whose election or appointment no provision is now or shall hereafter be made by law or in this article," etc.

Mr. COMSTOCK—That would not alter it at all. It would be the same thing precisely.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I hope the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] will be adopted, because it leaves it entirely in the control of the Legislature.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I answer that if you strike out the words as I propose, it is then precisely in the power of the Legislature where it ought to be.

Mr. HUTCHINS—If we strike that out I do not know where we shall be. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] says it does not affect any officer now that he knows of. It may not; but there may be cases where offices would be blotted out of existence by this provision, which would create confusion. I am in favor of leaving it to the Legislature that they may abolish the offices afterward under the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham].

Mr. COMSTOCK—I will tell the gentleman where we should be precisely. We should then be under the Constitution; and except so far as the Constitution prohibits, the Legislature could interfere; and with that position I apprehend every body ought to be content.

Mr. ALVORD—It does seem to me, sir, that there can be no sort of question upon the position taken by my colleague from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], with reference to this matter. If you say "the officers who are now by law appointed or elected," so far as those officers are concerned, placing them in the Constitution, you prohibit the Legislature from ever interfering in any way with regard to them. Let us get away from the city of New York for a single moment, and go into the country. In the city in which I reside, the treasurer or tax receiver, who to a certain extent represents the comptroller in the city of New York; being the financial officer of the city, is now appointed by the mayor and common council. Our city is rapidly increasing in population, and the time may come when it would be advisable and it may be almost necessary that that power should be taken from the mayor and common council and put into the hands of the people to elect that officer as they do the mayor and aldermen. That officer being now appointed by the mayor and common council, under the law which now exists, this could not be done. The amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] to the amendment of my colleague [Mr. Comstock] would absolutely prohibit the Legislature from interfering with it. I think the language is broad enough in the other section. It leaves it there to be prescribed by law. All officers not named in this article shall be prescribed by law. So far as it regards the present laws there is no necessity for the Legislature to go to work and pass laws to resurrect laws. They are the laws of the land, and if not inconsistent with the Constitution they will stand without the necessity of re-enactment. Let us leave the Legislature to alter or modify those laws as they may see fit to do.

Mr. LAPHAM—The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] is entirely mistaken as to the effect of this proposed amendment. These sections provide for the election of a mayor, they provide for the election of a comptroller, and receiver of taxes, and for no other officers. They provide for the election of three officers only. By this amendment it is proposed to have all officers in cities for whose election or appointment no provision is made in this article, elected by the voters of the city at large, or of some division thereof, or appointed by the mayor with the consent of the board of aldermen. Gentlemen will see that this is a renewal of the very question we have been discussing for several days as to whether any power shall be reserved to the Legislature to appoint these commissions. It utterly annihilates that power if this amendment passes.

Mr. ALVORD—It says "city officers."

Mr. LAPHAM—Many of them are city officers; that is the very claim made here, and that will be the claim made if this amendment is adopted; that it wipes out entirely the power of any appointment of officers to officiate in the cities in any capacity except in one of the modes provided; that is, elected by the voters of the city at large, or appointed by the mayor. That is the intention of this amendment. Now, the amendment I propose is this: it provides for a casus omissus. In case there is no provision by existing laws, or shall be no provision made by laws hereafter to be enacted, or if, in the Constitution, no provision is made, then it provides the manner in which officers shall be chosen. That is the object of this provision, so that the section when amended, if amended as I propose, will read in these words: "All officers for whose election or appointment no provision is now or shall hereafter be made by law or in this article, shall be elected by the voters of the city at large." That leaves the Legislature at liberty from time to time, as necessity shall require, to change the mode of appointment of one or more of these officers.

Mr. DALY—The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], in my judgment, does not alter the sense of the original section. I took occasion to call the attention of the Convention this morning to the importance of this particular provision, and with reference to the ingenious manner in which it was framed. I stated then, and I state now, that under this provision in reference to existing laws there are officers, at least in the city of New York, under existing laws, who are not city officers. How it may be in other counties or in other cities in the State I am not informed. But there is a large number of officers discharging public duties in the city of New York who do not come under the denomination of city officers. I stated this morning that the practical effect of this section, if enacted, would be to recognize this class of officers as exempt from the operation of the general provision which provides for the election by the people or the appointment by the local authorities of city officers. I agree with the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], as I think any lawyer must agree, that the effect of a positive provision of this kind in the fundamental law, accompanied by an exception excepting officers in existing laws, impliedly expresses that the class of excepted officers is not to be elected or appointed in the manner provided for.

Mr. LAPHAM—Will the gentleman allow me a question? Are not the Central park commissioners to be deemed city officers within the meaning of this article?

Mr. DALY—No, sir. They do not come under the denomination of city officers.

Mr. LAPHAM—They act nowhere else but in the city.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], what kind of officers they are unless city officers?

Mr. LAPHAM—I suggest they are city officers, and if this amendment prevails they would have to be elected by the electors at large or appointed by the mayor.

Mr. ALVORD—I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] or the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] whether the result of the amendment as proposed does not take away from the Legislature the power ever to change the law by which the park commissioners are at present appointed?

Mr. LAPHAM—No, sir.

Mr. ALVORD—It looks to me as if it did. I am perfectly willing, so long as the Legislature shall see fit, to have the Central park commissioners appointed in the manner that they are now, that they should be so appointed; but if the Legislature wish to change their views on that subject, and cause them to be elected, I wish the Constitution to leave it so that they shall be. So in regard to the various commissions in the city of New York and any thing of that kind. This is an attempt on the part of these gentlemen, not only to take care of the police and the sanitary commissions, but now to go to work and put into the Constitution every existing commission, every one, so that you cannot get rid of it. The plain, simple, clear, unmistakable explanation of the proposition of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] and the section as it now stands, is to crystalize in the Constitution the city commissions now and forever, and take away from the Legislature any power to repeal or change them.

Mr. COMSTOCK—If these words are stricken out, as I propose, the provision is like that of the Constitution of 1846. The clause in the Constitution of 1846 provides that all city officers shall be elected by the people of the city, or some division of the city, or appointed by some authority of the city; and it does not make the exception which is made by these interpolated words. Now, it is not apparent to me why any one should wish to make this article of the Constitution more obnoxious to the people of the great cities than the Constitution under which we are now living. They hoped to have that Constitution changed for the better in respect to that; but here is a plain, naked proposition to make it infinitely more obnoxious. Now, one or two words about these city officers. It is said that the Central park commissioners are not city officers. How are they appointed, let me ask my friend from New York [Mr. Hutchins]?

Mr. HUTCHINS—They are appointed by the Legislature.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Then let me ask, if they are city officers, how could they be appointed by the Legislature under the Constitution of 1846? That Constitution, in black and white, prohibited that thing.

Mr. DALY—In answer to the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] I will call his attention to the provision of the Constitution of 1846 in these words:

"All city, town, and village officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate."

Mr. POND—Read the balance of the section.

Mr. DALY—That is the whole of it, for this purpose.

Mr. POND—I think not. The balance of the section provides for those subsequently created, for new officers.

Mr. COMSTOCK—That does not cover what I was talking about.

Mr. POND—But this Central park commission was a new office created by the Legislature under that clause.

Mr. DALY—I simply meant to say this: This section speaks of city, town and village officers. If the gentleman from Saratoga [Mr. Pond], who asked this question, will give me his attention for a moment, he will see that the first portion of this section refers to city, town and village officers, and prescribes the manner in which they shall be elected or appointed—that they shall be elected by the people or appointed by the authorities thereof, that is, by the authorities of the city, town or village. Then the remaining passage which he desires me to read refers to other officers who are not city officers, as they come under another designation, and they are to be appointed or elected as the Legislature shall provide. Now, I say that the officers in the commissions fall under the designation of "other officers;" and have been so regarded by the judicial decisions of the courts. And therefore under this amendment which has been made on the motion of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] there is a provision in accordance with the provision of the Constitution of 1846 providing for the mode of the appointment or election of city officers except those under existing laws; and those under existing laws do not come under the denomination of city officers, as understood when the Constitution of 1846 was enacted, for if they did they could not be appointed in the manner which the laws creating them have provided, but must, if they were city officers, have been elected or appointed in the mode prescribed by the Constitution of 1846. This has been the judicial interpretation of the courts, and the officers under "existing laws," that is, under the commissions, come under the designation in the Constitution of 1846 of "other officers," that is, officers other than city officers who may be appointed in the mode which the Legislature shall direct, as the courts have held, and which they could not have held if they had regarded them as city officers within the meaning of the Constitution of 1846. The section is therefore susceptible of the construction which the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has put upon it, being positive in the provision providing for the mode of the election of city officers, or appointment of city officers, and then excepting from that provision all officers under existing laws, it makes a distinction between the one and the other—a distinction similar to that which exists in the Constitution of 1846. This is my interpretation, but at all events the question raised is manifestly so grave a one that the Convention should hesitate before they enact a sweeping clause of this nature, which, in the language of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] may crystalize the commissions under existing laws, by a fundamental constitutional provision.

Mr. RUMSEY—I stated this morning, when I offered an amendment, that I desired to keep the cities entirely under the control of the Legislature so far as it could be; and when I said so I intended precisely what I said; and I am willing now that a provision should be made here by which the Legislature shall have the power to change the mode of appointment of city officers. The amendment which I proposed this morning was adopted, and when the whole section was stricken out that went out with it. I have prepared an amendment which I propose to offer as an addition to this section. If the gentleman from

Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] will listen to it as read by the Secretary, it will, I think, satisfy him, and accomplish the object which all parties have in view with regard to this matter.

The SECRETARY read the amendment, for information, as follows:

"Nothing in this article contained shall be construed to prohibit the Legislature from abolishing any office in such cities, except the office of mayor and comptroller, or to change the mode of their election."

The PRESIDENT stated the question upon the amendment offered by Mr. Lapham to the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock.

Mr. HUTCHINS—In relation to this matter of the Central park commission, for, really, that is the only commission affected by this proposed amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], I would say that I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] should be adopted.

Mr. DALY—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Are there not other officers appointed under existing laws in the city of New York besides the Central park commission? Are there not the police commissions, the health commissions, the audit board, and others appointed under existing laws?

Mr. HUTCHINS—I know of no other commissions appointed by State authority. We are speaking of commissions appointed by State authorities—by the Governor or by the Legislature. The police commissions and the health commissions stand upon entirely different ground. That has been discussed here, and every member of the Convention understands it. Now, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] asked me why, if the Central park commissioners were city officers, it was not unconstitutional to pass the act creating that commission, and said that if they were city officers the act was clearly unconstitutional. I would inform the gentleman that that act was passed in pursuance of a provision in the last clause of the second section of the tenth article of the Constitution of 1846, which provides that "all officers whose offices may thereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed as the Legislature may direct;" and under that provision, upon the question being raised on one occasion, in the first district, the supreme court decided that the law was constitutional.

Mr. ALVORD—How is your street commissioner appointed?

Mr. HUTCHINS—The street commissioner is appointed by the mayor.

Mr. ALVORD—I want to know, then, if our view is correct, if it should be necessary hereafter to appoint him in some other way, by an election of the people, in the former way the Legislature would not be forbidden to make that change.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I think not.

Mr. ALVORD—I think they are.

Mr. HUTCHINS—Now, as the gentleman disagrees with me, I aver that if we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] it certainly covers the whole case, because it expressly provides that the Legislature may hereafter abolish any city office, except the mayor and comptroller, and change the mode of appointment, and that provision would certainly cover it, and I would vote in favor of it. That has been adopted once by the Convention, as a part of the third section, and was stricken out when the third section was stricken out, and if the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] should be voted down, as also the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], I hope then to have the opportunity to vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], that will cover all these cases, remove all doubt, and put the entire control of the matter of abolishing any office in the hands of the Legislature.

Mr. LAPHAM—I do not see how there can be any question whatever in regard to the effect of this section, in case the amendment I have submitted is adopted. What is, then, the provision of the section? It is simply this: in case there is no provision now made by law, and no provision shall hereafter be made by law, and no provision is contained in the article itself, then officers shall be appointed or elected as provided by law. It leaves the legislation to be changed precisely as the necessities of the case may suggest. It leaves all existing laws in force.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Let me ask the gentleman wherein, in substance and effect, his amendment differs from mine?

Mr. LAPHAM—I will state to the gentleman very frankly. The amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] provides that every officer in a city for whose election or appointment no special provision is made in the section, shall be elected by the electors, or appointed by the mayor. It blots out every law providing for the appointment or designation of an officer. It wipes out the entire legislation of the State, and prohibits any future legislation on the subject. That is the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. My amendment leaves the existing legislation in force. It provides for future legislation, but simply makes provision in case there is an omission in legislation for the selection of an officer, as to the way in which he shall be selected.

Mr. DALY—I claim that the gentleman has not answered, and cannot answer, the question raised as to this section. It is as plain as words can express it, that if the officers who are embraced under existing laws, are not city officers, the mode of appointment which is applicable to city officers is not applicable to them; or, at all events, it raises an exceedingly doubtful question. I submit whether we should put such a provision in the fundamental law. This is not a political question. It is a very serious and grave question with regard to the future powers of the Legislature. The Constitution of 1846 which I have just read has defined the manner of the appointment of city officers, providing that they shall be either elected or appointed by the local authorities of the city, or the town, or the village; and then provides for other officers who shall be elected or appointed in the manner which the Legislature may provide, and all those officers come under the latter designation. I beg leave to say to my colleague from New York [Mr. Hutchins], that I agree with him in regard to the Central park commission. It has been well managed, and highly beneficial to the city; but I do not agree with him that the whole construction of this section is confined in its operation to that commission. I enumerated ten commissions the other day, mentioning them by name, which came under the general designation of "other officers." They are not city officers, because they are not elected or appointed by the local electors or authorities, as the Constitution of 1846 requires in respect to city officers, and therefore they must necessarily come under the designation of "other officers," in the language of the existing Constitution, and the present mode of appointing them may be perpetuated—or, as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] said, "crystalized"—by this provision of the Constitution.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Lapham, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK—With regard to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], I cannot accept that proposition as a substitute for mine. It is not satisfactory. It entirely removes the principle of local government, as embraced in the Constitution of 1846. The object of my amendment was to leave the Constitution now as the Constitution of 1846 was. His amendment entirely subverts all that, if I understand it.

Mr. RUMSEY—The amendment which I propose leaves the whole matter entirely under the control of the Legislature. That is clearly where the majority of this Convention intend these things shall be left, and I therefore move my amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock].

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inquire of the gentleman if that proposition has been passed upon in committee as a distinct proposition?

Mr. RUMSEY—It is the same thing, with a little alteration.

The PRESIDENT—If the substance be the same, it will be received.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the substitute proposed by Mr. Rumsey, as follows:

"Nothing in this article contained shall be construed to prohibit the Legislature from abolishing the office of any such city, except the office of mayor and comptroller, or to change the mode of their selection.

Mr. COMSTOCK—It seems to me—and I suppose that is the intention—that this leaves it competent for the Legislature to provide that the Governor may appoint the mayor.

Mr. RUMSEY—Any thing you have a mind to. Any thing the Legislature chooses.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I do not understand this Convention to have accepted any such principle as that at all.

Mr. ALVORD—I would ask the President—I do not know that it is a question of order, but I would ask, through the President, the Convention—whether this is not a virtual repeal, without reconsideration of the provision as it stands now, which has been accepted; and that is, that the election or appointment of all these officers must be made either by the mayor, or by the people. It strikes that virtually out, and it is in a backhanded way that it is done by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey]. It is not a reconsideration of what we have already passed upon, but it is a virtual rejection of what is already passed upon, by putting in matter which is entirely different.

Mr. RUMSEY—It is an amendment. It is not out of order, as I understand it, because it is a general amendment to the section, and therefore it is in order. It does just precisely what I understand I want to do, and what I understand that the rest of the Convention want to do; and that is to leave this whole question to the Legislature; and I would do it by striking out the entire article, leaving the whole question to the Legislature, if that motion were made.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I would ask the gentleman what vote of this Convention indicates, that it is the desire of this Convention, that the whole question should be left to the Legislature, whether officers should be elected or appointed?

Mr. RUMSEY—I think every vote given upon this article shows that the Convention has no sort of idea of organizing cities as a distinct government, excluding the power of the Legislature over them.

Mr. DALY—Will the gentleman allow me to ask whether he understands the vote of this Convention, as a repudiation of this principle in the Constitution of 1846, providing for the election or appointment by the local authorities of city officers?

Mr. RUMSEY—No, sir, I do not understand it as doing any such thing. I understand it as the determination of this Convention to consider all the cities of this State, as they ought to be considered, as simple, naked corporations, and subject to the power and control of the Legislature, as every other corporation ought to be.

Mr. DALY—Did the Constitution of 1846 leave them in that position under this provision?

Mr. RUMSEY—Perhaps it did not, sir; but inasmuch as it did not, it did not do what it ought to have done, in my judgment. I do not propose to go over this whole matter and discuss the question of the propriety of the election or appointment of those officers, or the rights of cities In my judgment, the cities have already every thing that the country has. When you give to them the right to organize—the same right that the country has to be organized as towns and counties—they have all that the rural districts have; and when you give to them corporate powers beyond that, you give them exceptional legislation in their favor, beyond what the mass of the people of the State have; and it is all idle to talk about their not having the same rights and privileges that the rest of the State have. They have all those rights, and more than that. Every thing beyond what the rural districts have with regard to their local organization is a boon given to them beyond what the rural districts have; and in granting them, the Legislature may do so upon such terms as it deems proper.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Another question, if the gentleman will allow me: Whether city officers do not perform many of the duties that are performed in towns by town officers?

Mr. RUMSEY—Certainly.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Should not cities have therefore, the same power to elect city officers, as towns have to elect town officers?

Mr. RUMSEY—No, sir, they should not.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Why not?

Mr. RUMSEY—For the simple reason that all the powers that the cities have got beyond what the towns have got, is a mere matter of favor given to their exceptional legislation in their favor beyond what the towns and the counties have. And besides, in regard to almost every officer that is appointed in the town, the manner of appointment is directed by the Legislature. Why not do it in the cities as well?

Mr. ALVORD—I must rise to a point of order, that the amendment of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] if adopted, makes this section inconsistent with itself. We have already provided that "all officers for whose election or appointment no provision is made by existing laws, or in this article, shall be elected by the voters of the city at large, or of some division thereof, or appointed by the mayor, with the consent of the board of aldermen, as shall be provided by law." And this proposition of the gentleman from Steuben is in an entirely different direction, giving two methods of appointment in the same article, each inconsistent with the other.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that that may be ground for its rejection by the Convention, but that it is not within his province to reject it for that reason.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the amendment offered by Mr. Rumsey.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered; seventeen delegates only rising to second the call.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I shall ask to have the roll called if we are to have this kind of legislation here.

Mr. MORRIS—In all due respect, I think that fifteen is the number required to order the ayes and noes.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] that twenty are required to order the ayes and noes.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Rumsey, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 30 to 30.

Mr. W. C. BROWN—Is another amendment now in order?

The PRESIDENT—An amendment is now in order.

Mr. W. C. BROWN—I move to strike out all of the section down to and including the words "different classes," in the eighth line, and insert in place thereof, from the second article of the tenth section of the present Constitution, commencing "all city, town and village officers," etc. This clause has received judicial construction; it is well understood by the courts and the people, and I think it is desirable that it should be retained.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I rise to a point of order. That amendment is not germane to my proposition. It proposes to strike out a part of the section which precedes the part to which my amendment relates, altogether.

Mr. W. C. BROWN—Strike out down to the words "prescribed by law," in the fourteenth line.

Mr. McDONALD—That has already been adopted by this Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understands that it was afterward stricken out.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the amendment offered by Mr. W. C. Brown, as follows:

Strike out of the section all down to the word "law," so as to leave only the following paragraph as it now stands:

"No city officer shall, during his term of office, hold a seat in the common council of the city, or in the Legislature of the State, and the acceptance of such a seat shall vacate his office."

And insert the following:

"All city, town and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose. All other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people or appointed as the Legislature may direct."

Mr. BICKFORD—Mr. President, that was adopted a great while ago.

The PRESIDENT—And stricken out afterward.

Mr. BICKFORD—No, sir; it was adopted months ago. It was adopted on the motion of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] in the celebrated case when he moved it and afterward wished that he had not.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—If it is not so, it can be corrected.

The PRESIDENT—It can be corrected by the Committee on Revision.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I hope this motion will prevail; not only for the reason which has been alluded to by my friend near me [Mr. W. C. Brown], that it has already received judicial construction; but the language is precisely that which, for myself, I desire to employ in regard to this question of city powers. It puts the election or appointment of the officers of a city in the hands of the electors or authorities of the city, and that is precisely according to my theory. I do not know in regard to the theory of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey]; but in the simplicity of the district in which I live, I think we understand this question very well, and the principle of local self-government we hold to be very important; I therefore am in favor of this amendment.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I accept the amendment of the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C Brown]. Being accepted, I suppose now a further amendment is in order.

The PRESIDENT—A further amendment is in order.

Digitized by Google

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move to strike out in the latter part of the amendment the words "and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law," and insert after the word "Constitution" in the second line, "or whose offices shall be hereafter created," so that it will read thus:

"All city, town and village officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, or whose offices shall be created hereafter, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, or by some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof, as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose."

So that the Constitution will apply the same rules to offices to be created hereafter, that it applies to offices existing. Instead of leaving the appointment or election of officers whose offices shall be hereafter created, to the discretion of the Legislature, it applies this constitutional principle, this same rule of local government, to future and to existing officers, so that they may be alike elected by the people of the city, town or village, or appointed by some authority thereof. It applies the same principle of local government in respect to future offices that it does apply in respect to existing offices. That is the purpose of my amendment and that will be the effect of it if it is adopted.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would ask for the reading of the amendment of the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C. Brown], as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock].

The amendment was read by the SECRETARY as follows:

Mr. W. C. BROWN—I move to amend the section by striking out all down to and including the word "law" in line twelve, and inserting in lieu thereof, the following:

"All city, town and village officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose."

Mr. HUTCHINS—I do not understand that to be the whole amendment as offered by the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C. Brown].

The SECRETARY read further—

"All other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed as the Legislature may direct."

Mr. HUTCHINS—I understand the amendment of the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C. Brown] to take the entire section from the present Constitution and that contains this line—"And all officers whose offices may be hereafter created by law."

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would explain to the gentleman that that is precisely what I propose to strike out in that section and insert it in the other place, thus reversing the meaning entirely.

Mr. HUTCHINS—All I have to say is, that if this amendment is adopted, it destroys the health and police commissions.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—It must necessarily be so. It takes away from the Legislature the power of creating any officers except such as shall be locally elected or appointed. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. POND—When the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] made his first motion to amend, this evening, he said the object was to make this section precisely as the Constitution of 1846 left this question, and I understood him to affirm that, by that Constitution, it was expressly provided that "all city, town and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, or by some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose." I understood him to affirm, also, that that was the only language in the section that applied to city officers; and when I asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] who read so much of that section to read the residue, I was responded to by that gentleman by his saying that the remaining portion of it had no reference to city officers, and that the Central park commissioners in New York were not city officers at all, and could not be, because they could not be appointed by the Legislature under the Constitution of 1846. But now, when the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C. Brown] offers section 2 of article 10 of the Constitution of 1846 as an amendment, then the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] discovers very quick that this last clause does refer to these commissioners, and that they are city officers, and he proposes, instinctively and instantly, to amend this very section of the Constitution of 1846, so as to prohibit the Legislature from having or exercising the very power which is expressly conferred by the section. As I understood it the words "city, town and village officers," in this section of the Constitution of 1846, is only applied to officers then in existence—that is, in existence at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1846. And the court of appeals, as I understand it, so construed those words as used in this section, and also gave a construction to the residue of the section which I perceive the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] also understands very well now, and that is that "all other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed as the Legislature may direct." Now, Mr. President, I understood that this last clause of the section did refer to city officers; that the Central park commission, for instance, was an office created by the Legislature, after the adoption of the Constitution of 1846, and it was therefore a city office, and it would consequently be abolished by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C. Brown] as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] proposes to change it. I discover the design when this section of the Constitution of 1846, pure and simple, is proposed to be inserted here. I perceive that the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] understands the section as I do, and hence he proposes now to strike out the words in the last clause of it, which, according to his former construction, did not apply to city officers at all. He proposes, as an amendment, to strike those words out and put them into the first clause of the section, so that the entire power of creating new offices and prescribing the manner of filling them shall be entirely taken away from the Legislature. Now, sir, this is the old question over again. We are still engaged on the same question we have been engaged in discussing and voting on all day, and that is whether the power to create these commissions is to be abolished and entirely stricken out of the Constitution we are to frame, including the sanitary and police commissions. For one I am opposed to abolishing these commissions. I am opposed to taking away from the Legislature the power over these cities. Why, sir, they claim for the city of New York the power of local government. Sir, the city of New York is not a local institution at all. It is rather a national than a local institution. And rather than to have the whole power of the government of that city vested in the residents thereof, it ought to be conferred on and exercised by the nation itself; but certainly the State is a small enough territory, a small enough municipality, to have the supervision of the laws applicable to that locality, if it be a locality at all. Mr. President, what was the origin of these commissions? It seems to me now that many gentlemen here have entirely forgotten the necessities out of which they grew and were created. Why, sir, they were the growth of necessities existing in that city, and this fact has been admitted on this floor by the gentleman [Mr. E. Brooks] who is now arguing in favor of their abolition, and the same gentleman who originally aided in procuring the passage of those very laws. It has been stated on this floor, and I believe by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], that the police commission was the result of an application to the Legislature by the unanimous voice of the people of that great city. I would like to know why, sir, when the Legislature obeyed that voice, and responded to it by the creation of this and other commissions, they are to be charged with an evasion of the Constitution, by trick and artifice and legerdemain? I assert, on the contrary, that their action was within the very letter of the Constitution of 1846. Sir, the Constitution of 1846 was so made, in my judgment, by design, to guard against the very contingencies that arose and not by mistake, and it would have been a glaring defect, in my judgment, in that Constitution, for the Convention that framed it, to have bound up the sovereignty of this State, so that no matter what exigency might arise, no matter what necessities demanded the creation of these commissions, by the enactment of a law that should take away from the mayor of the city the power which he possessed, or the powers which the local authorities of the city possessed and abused, it would, I say, have been a glaring defect in that Constitution not to have put a clause in it providing for a supervisory power, on the part of the Legislature, over this locality. And it would be a graver error still if this Convention, after the experience which has been had under the Constitution of 1846, after the exercise of this supervisory power by the Legislature and after it had been called into exercise by the unanimous voice of all parties in that locality—it would be a gross mistake for us now not only to blot out these commissions, but also to strike from the Constitution we are to frame, the power to create them and all jurisdiction on the part of the sovereign power of the people, to supervise and regulate by law this locality, the city of New York, in any manner whatever. Now, sir, it has been said, in advocacy of the principle to abolish this power, as proposed by the representatives from the city of New York, and others, that it is necessary to do away with the power on the part of the Legislature to create these commissions, because they are made in the interest of party, and because their action has been and is now partisan. Well, I think that has been very ably answered by one of the representatives from New York [Mr. Stratton], who showed conclusively, as I think, that the action of the police commission, at least, is not obnoxious to such a charge. But, suppose it is properly chargeable with that, what do the gentlemen from New York wish to change it for? Why, simply to have their political party get possession of these same trusts and offices, and will they not be wielded in the interest of party then? Why, sir, the objection of these gentlemen is, if it is used in the interest of any party, as they allege, that their party does not possess it, and that ours does. I speak of the republican party, to which I belong.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I perceive that without you saying it. [Laughter.]

Mr. POND—Now, if it be true that these commissions were wielded in the interests of party in the city of New York, I would like to know if that is a greater evil than would exist to leave all these interests and this patronage exclusively to the local authorities. They would then be wielded in the interests of party, and not only all the offices created by these commissions would be thus used for the interest of party, but all the other city offices and patronage combined will be so used also. So that the result of creating these commissions, even if what is charged is true, is to divide between the two political parties the offices and patronage of that city, instead of having it possessed and wielded exclusively by one party. I perceive that Judge Garvin, a gentleman from New York, in arguing this morning upon the proposition to abolish the board of supervisors in that city, and in opposing it, seemed to have a distinct and definite idea that a division of powers between different bodies in that city, was necessary and essential as checks and balances, the one upon the other. In regard to that subject he contended that the interests of the city absolutely required a division of responsibility, and the lodging of various powers in different bodies, so that they might, as before said, operate as checks and balances, the one upon the other. I recognize the justness and the soundness of that argument, and think it applies in full force to this subject. But it is also further intimated by gentlemen on this floor, that the city of New York desires the possession of this power to control matters in that city, to the exclusion of the State, and that unless they have that power accorded to them, and incorporated, as they wish it, in the Constitution we frame, it will be surely defeated. Well, sir, I prefer to have a Constitution that ought to be adopted defeated, than to have a Constitution framed here which ought to be defeated, adopted; and for one I shall not change my action on this subject upon any such menace or threat thus implied or expressed by any gentleman from New York or elsewhere. I consider that I am here to aid in framing a Constitution for the State, the whole of it, and not for the exclusive benefit of a mere locality of it, and my duty is to endeavor to aid in making such provision as in my judgment the public good of the whole State requires, and in doing that I am not to consult solely the wishes of any particular locality. I am to consult the public good, the good of the people of this great State, in its sovereign and collective capacity as a State, as well as its separate parts. And, as I said before, in my judgment, experience has taught us that to lodge all these vast powers, including the power to make police and sanitary regulations in the local authority of a city exclusively, would be to allow them to be perverted from their proper uses to partisan ends and corrupt purposes, and to the uses of all those cliques, clans and rings which perversion originally induced the adoption of this commission system. Now, sir, I repeat that I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] will not prevail, and for the reason, among others, that I think the gentleman who offered it has become convinced, if he did not know before, that the last clause of the second section of article 10 of the Constitution of 1846 does apply to city officers, and gives the Legislature power over them, and to create new ones, and inasmuch as he appeared to be satisfied with that section, and claimed that the amendment first offered by him only placed the section we are considering back to where the Constitution of 1846 left this subject, and as I am also in favor of the section as it is contained in the Constitution of 1846, I hope the amendment proposed to be made to it will be defeated, and that the section on this subject, pure and simple, as contained in the Constitution of 1846, may be adopted.

Mr. FOLGER—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared lost.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I would ask, Mr. President, if the amendment of the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C. Brown] has been adopted by the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—It has not been. It was accepted by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] and became his amendment, and it was then voted down.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The gentleman [Mr. Comstock], if the Chair will allow me, moved further to amend the section offered by the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C. Brown].

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] he did not move to amend—he accepted the amendment of the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C. Brown] and then amended it as a matter of right.

Mr. POND—I think the Chair is mistaken. He accepted the amendment of the gentleman from St. Lawrence, and then proposed an amendment to it.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair did not so understand it.

Mr. FOLGER—I certainly understood the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] to move to amend by striking out in one place to insert in the other.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] that he accepted the amendment offered by the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C. Brown].

Mr. FOLGER—Then I move the amendment of the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. W. C. Brown] pure and simple.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—And upon that I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. M. I. Townsend, for the previous question, and it was declared carried.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would ask for the reading of the amendment.

The SECRETARY again read the amendment.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Mr. LAPHAM—I move to strike out all of section 11, after the word "article" in the third line. That section was adopted by being passed without objection when it was read. It will be seen that the part which I propose to strike out is that which relates to the passage of general laws for the organization and government of cities, and prohibits special legislation. The section will lead to endless difficulty. The necessities of cities, and the peculiar provisions required in city charters, are so varied that they will lead to constant difficulty if this provision is left in the Constitution. I propose to leave that whole subject with the Legislature, as it has always been heretofore.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I rise to a question of order. The Convention has adopted this section, and a motion to strike it out is not in order.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] that there has been no formal adoption of it. The vote has not been taken separately on the adoption of the sections, except upon amendments proposed to them.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I understand that that was the general or uniform course. It was during the first part of the sessions of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will hold that wherever a distinct vote has been taken upon any proposition, and it has been adopted or rejected, before the matter can be amended it must be reconsidered. No vote having been taken on this section, the Chair thinks the point of order not well taken, and it is not necessary to move to reconsider.

Digitized by Google

Mr. VERPLANCK—I supposed it was tantamount to a vote.

Mr. ALVORD—If the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] will pay more attention to these matters, he will find there is no difficulty. This section authorizes cities, towns and villages of this State, as they shall grow up to the position where they may require a city government, under some general provisions of law by the Legislature, to organize themselves into cities, without going to the Legislature and asking for a special charter. But we specially reserve to the Legislature, if in their judgment they shall deem it best, the power to pass special laws on the subject. It seems to me this will avoid a great deal of unnecessary legislation if the section is permitted to remain as it is. It is true, no special act shall be passed unless the object cannot be obtained under general laws, but it gives perfect power to the Legislature to change the complexion of the organic law of any cities of this State, in reference to all their requirements as, in the judgment of the Legislature, they may see fit. It does not take that power away from them; but it only lays down a general form of laws, in order to enable communities to commence a city government, but it does not prevent cities coming to the Legislature to procure such action as may be necessary, in modification of the general law, to meet their special wants.

Mr. W. C. BROWN—I hope this motion will prevail, and that the section will be stricken out. It is utterly impracticable for the Legislature to devise any general charter or general law which shall be suitable for any more than one particular city. And there is also this other objection, that it is entirely unnecessary. It neither confers power on the Legislature which they have not got, nor does it restrict them from doing any thing which they desire to do.

Mr. LANDON—I hope this section will be stricken out. In my opinion it is utterly impossible to pass general laws which shall apply to the government of all the cities. They differ in their circumstances, they differ in their necessities, they differ in a great many requirements. When I say it is impossible to pass such general laws, I think I am stating what is simply the truth. You might just as well undertake to cut a coat and have it fit every man and boy in this room, as to have a general law answer for all the cities, large and small, in the State.

Mr. RUMSEY—We have already in the Constitution of 1846 a provision of this kind:

"Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes and in cases where, in the judgment of the Legislature, the objects of the corporation cannot be attained under general laws." Art. VIII, sec. 1.

Now, that is precisely analogous to the portion of the section which the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] proposed to strike out; and under that section the court of appeals of this State has decided that the Legislature may, by special law make any corporations they see fit, they being entirely the judges whether it was necessary or not, or whether it could be embraced in the general law. It is therefore entirely useless, and the courts have held that it does not restrict the Legislature at all. It is useless, I think, to put things in the Constitution that have no meaning according to the settled construction of the courts.

Mr. MURPHY—I am sorry to hear the sentiments expressed by several gentlemen on this floor, to-night, in opposition to general laws for municipal corporations. Our statute books are burdened with special acts incorporating villages and cities. This special legislation not only swells the public statutes of the State, but introduces confusion into our laws and inflicts upon our courts interminable litigation. Gentlemen say we cannot pass general laws for the incorporation of villages and cities. I grant that in some cases there are peculiar circumstances which will require special laws; but take the great body of provisions which are required for cities or villages, and you find them common and general to all. In the first place, a large portion of municipal charters is occupied with the powers which the common council or board of trustees may exercise in regard to municipal regulations, commonly embraced in penal ordinances. Now, those ordinances for villages will be proper for all the villages of the State; and, in the same manner, the penal regulations may be the same for all the cities. For instance: fast driving, improper exhibitions in public places, obstructions in streets, and the like, are common to all communities, and should be reached by enactments common to all. There is no necessity of repeating these powers over and over again in separate charters. Take another subject-matter—that of opening, regulating and grading streets and making contracts with reference to all these objects. The same principle should prevail in all cities. There should be one uniform system throughout the State, not only for the convenience of legislation, but for this further important reason, that, when you have the decision of a court in regard to the statute, upon a question of construction arising in one city, you have a decision by which all the cities of the State have a rule, and much litigation is avoided. In the case of special charters, you multiply litigation, because the terms and provisions of these special charters differ from each other, and each give rise to its own questions of construction. As I remarked a few days ago, there is another important advantage in general laws. Such statutes will not be altered, amended or repealed by hasty and inconsiderate legislation, but will always receive, when any such action is proposed, the attention, supervision and examination of the representatives of all the cities and villages in the State, instead of the representatives only of a single city or village as in case of a special law, which relates only to that city or village. Our statute books are full of these special laws, improvidently and carelessly enacted, and our courts are constantly called upon to make decisions upon them; and thus, legislatively and judicially, the State is burdened, when it might all be avoided by an uniform system, which would be afforded by general laws. I do not pretend that there may not be a necessity of special legislation on some subjects peculiar to one municipality or another, arising from its location; but as far as that is concerned this provision wisely provides that in such cases the Legislature may, when necessary, pass special laws. What is proposed by general laws in regard to cities is similar to what has been enacted in regard to railroads. There is probably no subject more difficult to determine by general law than the construction of railroads. Yet, we have a general law for that purpose and it works well. When it is found that there is something specially needed in regard to some particular road, that legislation if proper, is granted, without being in conflict with the general law. I hope, therefore, sir, that we will extend this principle of general laws to our cities and villages.

Mr. RUMSEY—Will the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] say whether this section we have under consideration will accomplish his object and compel the Legislature to pass any general law with regard to cities or villages?

Mr. MURPHY—I will answer the gentleman. Under the provisions of the Constitution of 1846, requiring the Legislature to pass general laws in regard to corporations other than municipal, the Legislature complied with the requirement.

Mr. RUMSEY—What I mean is simply this: does this section, under the decision of the court of appeals, compel the Legislature to abstain from passing special laws, or does it compel it to pass general laws in any case? If it does not do that it is a useless provision.

Mr. MURPHY—I have not the particular section before me to which the gentleman refers. If he will read it I may then be able to answer it.

Mr. RUMSEY—I will read it: "The Legislature, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall pass such laws as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of this article." That they do not propose to strike out. This is what they propose to strike out: "Except in cases general laws shall also be passed for the organization and government of cities, and no special act shall be passed, except in cases where, in the judgment of the Legislature, the object of such act cannot be attained under general laws." This is what they propose to strike out, simply because the court of appeals have said that it leaves it optional with the Legislature to pass a special law in every case.

Mr. MURPHY—I will ask the gentleman, on the other hand, does not the present Constitution require the Legislature to pass general laws for the creating of corporations?

Mr. RUMSEY — Certainly it does; and the court of appeals have decided that the Constitution provides that they may do it, but that it rests in the judgment of the Legislature to determine whether the object could or could not be attained by general laws.

Mr. MURPHY — Has not the Legislature passed those laws?

Mr. RUMSEY—They have; but the trouble is the court of appeals—

Mr. MURPHY—What the court of appeals decided on this question is not pertinent to this matter. The Legislature have passed general laws for the incorporation of railroads, manufacturing companies, and for all kinds of corporations which they were required to do, though according to the court of appeals they were not bound to do so. The conscientious, if not the legal obligation existed, and has been observed. Members of the Legislature are bound to carry out the requirements of the Constitution, I mean as men of truth and regardful of their oath of office. There may not be any means of legal enforcement of it, but they are nevertheless bound to pass general laws wherever the object of incorporation can be effected in their conscientious judgment in that mode.

Mr. RUMSEY—The trouble is, the court of appeals says they are not.

Mr. LAPHAM — The provision of the Constitution of 1846, to which the gentleman [Mr. Murphy] has alluded, and which he assisted in framing, expressly excepts corporations for municipal purposes. It does not provide at all for general laws for municipal corporations.

Mr. MURPHY—I was aware of that. We are proposing to take that step now. The Convention of 1846 was not prepared to go so far then.

Mr. LAPHAM—I am arguing that the Constitution of 1846, in this respect, does not need any change. We have not been sent here for the purpose of making a change in the provisions of the Constitution of 1846, in this particular. There is another objection to this provision. This provision is mandatory. It says the Legislature shall enact these laws. It supersedes all old laws upon the subject, and requires a new system or code of laws for this purpose to be framed. Now, there is a general law upon the statute book under which every incorporated village, on reaching a population of a certain amount, may form itself into a city. But it has been found that the general law, in regard to the incorporation of villages, and regulating their affairs, is so imperfect in its character, that almost every incorporated village in the State has been compelled to go to the Legislature for special relief. And in the very nature of things, applications will be annually made by cities and incorporated villages for such special enactments as they find necessary. It is inevitable that it will be so. This attempt to provide by the Constitution for general legislation, even if successful, will never do any good. It is the uselessness of the provision that led me to move to strike it out.

Mr. SMITH—I trust this amendment will not prevail. It will be remembered by gentlemen who have attended the sessions of this Convention, at an earlier stage of our deliberations, very much attention was given to this subject of special legislation. It was felt and agreed on all hands that there was a great evil under which the State had suffered. Efforts were made to provide against this evil, so far as it seemed practicable to go in that direction. It is suggested by the gentleman upon my left [Mr. Lapham], who makes the motion to strike out this section, that the provisions to which I allude refer to corporations other than municipal. That is true, but still the evil embraces special legislation in regard to municipal corporations as well, and the remedy now proposed is in the same direction as the provisions adopted in relation to other corporations. It is true, this provision does not take away from the Legislature the power to enact a special law.

Digitized by Google

It was not necessary to have a decision of the court of appeals to show us that. The section itself so reads, and is, therefore, plainly understood by every one. But it does require that the Legislature shall pass general laws under which municipal corporations may be organized. And the tendency of the provision, therefore, is to decrease special legislation by requiring the enactment of general laws under which these corporations may be organized. And although the section does not inhibit the Legislature from passing special laws, it will be a clear expression of the people of the State, if they adopt this Constitution, against the passage of special laws whshever general laws will attain the same object. It is to be presumed that the Legislature would respect the voice of the people, and refrain from passing special acts except in the rare cases where general laws would not answer the purpose. As the provision could do no harm, and might be productive of good, I see no reason why it should not be retained as it now stands. It is in the same direction that we have gone in relation to other subjects, and designed to relieve us from the evil under which the State has so long suffered.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Lapham to strike out the eleventh section, and it was declared lost.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Mr. President, when are the motions to reconsidor to be heard?

The PRESIDENT—They will be heard after a vote shall be passed in the affirmative, reconsidering the vote adopting the article, if it shall be adopted.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to strike out the whole article.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I call for a count.

Mr. PROSSER—I would like to hear the article read.

The SECRETARY read the article as amended.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—There is a specific amend ment which I have desired to offer before this time, but it had escaped my recollection. If the gentleman will for a moment withdraw his motion to strike out the article, I will offer it.

Mr. FOLGER—I will do so.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—It is to strike out the words "every two years" from the first section of this article. The city of Auburn and several other cities of this State, as the members of this Convention are aware, elect their mayors every year, for one year. There is no desire expressed to make any change in that respect. I move to strike out the words "every two years," and leave the term of office of the mayor to the law organizing each particular city.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. C. C. Dwight, and it was declared carried.

Mr. BECKWITH—I would call the attention of the Convention to what seems to me to be an inconsistency in section 2. It says: "No city officer shall, during his term of office, hold a seat in the common council of the city." I would like to know if a member of the common council is not a city officer? If so, I think this provision is inconsistent with itself.

Mr. HARRIS—He is an alderman.

Mr. BECKWITH—Is he not a city officer?

Mr. HARRIS—No; he is a ward officer.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I think that there is one officer who, in many cities, holds a seat in the common council, and that is the mayor, who, I think, being elected by the whole city must, of necessity, be held to be a city officer; this section will prohibit the mayors of cities, in those cities where they now sit in the common council, from sitting there. Then there are recorders; we once had a recorder sit in the common council of our city.

Mr. BECKWITH—I move to strke out the words, "in the common council of the city or."

Mr. ALVORD—I hope that the amendment, in that shape, will not prevail. I agree with the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Beckwith] that that may well be considered to mean an alderman or a common councilman. But it is true that in some of the cities of this State the mayor and recorder are members of the common council. I trust, if we are to make any provision in the Constitution on this subject, it will not be confined to the mayor. The mayor should be the executive, the head of the city government, and should have the same power, relatively, that the Governor of the State has—to pass upon the acts of the common council, by way of veto, and have a supervision over their actions. The recorder, in most instances, is a judicial officer, and he should also stand outside the ordinary acts of the common council that they are called upon to determine. I trust, therefore, that the full scope of the amendment of the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Beckwith] will not be adopted by this Convention.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—If the gentleman will submit an amendment, I think it will remedy the difficulty.

Mr. BECKWITH—I propose to amend it so that it will read "No city officer other than mayors and recorders shall, during their term of office, hold a seat," etc. The aldermen, I suppose, are ward officers.

Mr. ALVORD—I understood the gentleman to amend this so as to avoid the objection that I make. It certainly now makes it necessary that the mayor and recorder should be members of the common council. It makes them, by virtue of their office, members of the common council.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Beckwith, and it was declared lost.

Mr. RUMSEY—To remedy that apparent inconsistency, I move to amend by saying "members of common council shall hold no other office in the city, and no city officer shall hold a seat in the Legislature of the State, and the acceptance of such a seat shall vacate his office."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Rumsey, and it was declared adopted.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the article.

A DELEGATE—Is there not a motion pending to strike out the article.

The PRESIDENT—That was withdrawn.

The question being put on the adoption of the article, it was declared carried, and the article was referred to the Committee on Revision.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I give notice that I will, at some future day, move a reconsideration of the second section.

The PRESIDENT—Which notice will lie on the table.

Mr. FRANCIS—I move that we adjourn.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I ask what time that will adjourn us to?

The PRESIDENT—To to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Francis, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 1, 1868.

The Convention re-assembled, pursuant to adjournment, at ten o'clock A. M.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. GRAVES.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY, and approved.

Mr. GOULD—I ask leave of absence for Mr. Hale, of Essex, for one week, in consequence of sickness in his family.

No objection being made leave was granted.

Mr. GOULD—I ask leave of absence for Mr. Potter, of Erie, in consequence of sickness in his family.

No objection being made leave was granted.

Mr. GOULD—I ask leave of absence for Mr. E. A. Brown until Tuesday next.

The question was put on granting leave of absence, and it was declared lost.

Mr. AXTELL presented a memorial from the Seneca nation of Indians remonstrating against making Indians citizens.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole having the subject-matter in charge.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I will take this occasion to bring up the motion, of which I have given notice, to reconsider the article on corporations. If upon looking at the matter those who are present shall see any thing about it to suggest that we should wait for a larger attendance of the Convention, I will very cheerfully consent to a postponement, but I persuade myself that the purpose I have in view will meet with general approval. The article on corporations, document No. 53, is so framed that corporations must be formed under general laws, and shall not be created by special act except for municipal purposes. The purpose of my motion is to reconsider the article so as to include within the exception literary and charitable corporations. I propose to leave it possible for the Legislature to grant a special charter to a literary, scientific, charitable or benevolent corporation, for reasons which I will suggest to the Convention. I make this motion in the interest of charity, and in what I have to say for it I plead for the cause of charity, which I am satisfied will be very much obstructed and impeded unless this change in the article shall be adopted. In another sphere of public duty, and in the course of my profession, I happen to have become quite familiar with the laws of the State on the subject of charities. As the rule has been settled in our courts, and very deliberately settled after a contest of several years, a gift to public purposes, by which I mean a gift to any educational, literary, scientific, benevolent or charitable purpose whatever, is impossible, unless it is sustained by some legislation of the State. It is now the rule that at common law these gifts fall to the ground, all of them, without discrimination. They are sustainable only upon the legislative power, which power can be exerted either in special charters or in general laws for the formation of charitable corporations. It may occur to gentlemen that general laws may meet every case. We have a general law now, under which any charitable corporation can be formed—and when I use the word "charitable" I mean all these public institutions. In the eye of the law, and when lawyers speak of "charities" they mean public gifts, for any public purpose whatever They are all classed, in the judgment of the law, under the generic name of charities. We have, I say, a general law, under which charitable corporations can be formed. But there is a property limitation in that law, which is inconvenient, and according to which the larger charities which are sometimes created and endowed by individual benevolence, cannot be brought into existence at all; and I suppose the Legislature in passing general laws will always maintain that property limitation. I will mention what the limitation is now. You cannot form one of these charitable corporations under the general law with a capacity to take more than seventy-five thousand dollars of estate. That is about the limitation. Now, this is a wise mortmain policy. All legislative charters, all general acts of legislation in favor of charitable gifts, contain the mortmain principle; that is, the principle limiting the amount of property which the institution can take. Charity and mortmain in law, always go hand in hand, each attending the footsteps of the other. I do not suppose that the Legislature would ever enact general laws under which large charities can be endowed; because that would leave it to the discretion of any individual to give an immense estate for purposes over which the Legislature would have lost control. By special act of legislation that particular charity might not be approved. Therefore, in these general laws we now have, and I apprehend we always ought to have, this property restriction. Now, under this system of law the Vassar College never could have been created; the Cornell University never could have been created. There is not a college in the State that could ever have been brought into existence under these general laws, because their endowment exceeds vastly the sum or the value permitted by those general laws. It sometimes happens—and not very unfrequently—that a benevolent individual of great wealth dies, leaving a last will and testament to endow a charity, and leaves a million or two millions of dollars for some favorite charity of his own. Mr. Rose, of New York, left an estate of a million and a half of dollars. We all know what Mr. Cornell has done. We all know what Mr. Vassar has done. The same thing may be done by other individuals. There is no law in the State to sustain their particular schemes. Their charities cannot come into existence under a general law, because the Legislature never would and never ought to pass general laws by which institutions can be endowed with those immense sums. I think, therefore, that our Constitution should be so left that the liberal and wealthy can go to the Legislature and ask for a special charter, permitting them thus to create or endow their charities. I have only to say further that this kind of legislation is not within the evil intended to be checked and guarded against by this Constitution. The precise evil is those applications from private trading pecuniary corporations, for individual advantage and benefit, with which the Legislature is so much besieged, drawing around the Legislature all the influences of corruption. We have heard a great deal about that. Now, these applications for the chartering of charities are not attended with any of those influences. They do not appeal to the lobby. They do not appeal to any corrupting influence whatever; and they are rarely, if ever, opposed in the Legislature. They do not occupy the time of the Legislature. They do not fill the volumes of the statute laws. They are not, in any sense, as I conceive, within the evil which we intend to guard against in this Constitution. I, therefore, commend this proposition to the Convention, and ask that the article may be reconsidered, to the end that literary, charitable, benevolent and educational institutions may be brought within the exception.

The question was put on the motion offered by Comstock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I now propose to insert in the third line, after the word "municipal," these words:—

The PRESIDENT—Does the Chair understand this to be a new proposition, not offered before? Has the gentleman, at any prior time in Convention, offered this proposition?

Mr. COMSTOCK—No, sir, I have not.

The PRESIDENT—It then comes under the head of amendments generally.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I propose to insert in the third line of the article as proposed, after the word "municipal," the words "literary, scientific, charitable and benevolent." It will then read as follows:

"Corporations may be formed under general laws, but they shall not be created, or their powers increased or diminished, by special act, except for municipal, literary, scientific, charitable and benevolent purposes."

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried

The question recurred on the adoption of the article as amended, and being put it was declared carried, and the article was again referred to the Committee on Revision.

Mr. FOWLER offered the following resolution:

"WHEREAS, It is impossible for the janitor of this building to attend to making the fires and feeding the same in heaters necessary to warm this room and the rooms occupied by the attaches of the Convention, as the said janitor is necessarily engaged in performing his regular duties connected with the various city offices located in the building, therefore,

"Resolved, That William N. Lombard be and he is hereby appointed to make fires and attend to the same necessary to warm this room and to hoist and lower the flag on this building at the commencement and adjournment of each session of this Convention, and that he receive three dollars per day for each and every day so employed."

The PRESIDENT—This resolution is referred to the standing Committee on Contingent Expenses, under the rule.

The Convention will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on State Prisons and the prevention and punishment of crime.

Mr. GOULD—The report of this committee on the subject of State prisons and the prevention and punishment of crime, is one which is decidedly interesting to all the citizens of this State. It will be observed by every one that is here that we have not only not a quorum but only half a quorum; and whether it will be consistent to discuss a question of so much importance and magnitude as this with so few members present, it will be for the Convention to decide. It will be recollected that when the report of the Committee on Education was discussed, there was an equally small number present, and the result was that the article which presented the scheme of the Committee on Education was decided and voted upon by men who had never heard the argument at all and had not the benefit of knowing the ground upon which the committee acted. I suppose there will be the same result if we go on with this discussion. If there is any other committee desirous of going on with their report, I should be glad to have it substituted. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs if they are ready to report?

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—They are not ready.

Mr. GOULD—I submit entirely to the views of the Convention, but I could not allow it to pass without bringing the matter distinctly before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—No motion being made the Convention will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The Convention resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on State Prisons and the Prevention and Punishment of Crime, Mr. S. TOWNSEND, of Queens, in the chair.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the first section as follows:

SEC. 1. There shall be one superintendent of prisons, to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to hold his office for seven years. He shall have the charge and superintendence of the State prisons, and the supervision, with power of visitation, of all other places for the custody of persons charged with or convicted of crime. His compensation shall be fixed by law.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I move, Mr. Chairman, to substitute for the first section of the majority report the first and second sections of the report which I had the honor to make, which will be found in document No. 123.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the substitute offered by Mr. C. C. Dwight, as follows:

"SEC. 1. There shall be a board of managers of prisons, to consist of five persons to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall hold office for ten years, except that the five first appointed shall, in such manner as the Legislature may direct, be so classified that the term of one person so appointed shall expire at the end of each two years during the first ten years; and vacancies in the office afterward occuring, shall be filled in like manner.

"Such board shall have the charge and superintendence of the State prisons, and shall possess such powers and perform such duties in respect to the county jails, the local or district penitentiaries and other penal or reformatory institutions within the State, as the Legislature may by law impose upon them."

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—It will be observed by members of the committee who have examined the two reports which are now before them, that they differ only in respect to the organization of the central controlling and supervisory power, the power which is to exercise the supervision of the State prisons, reformatories and penal institutions of the State. There was entire unanimity, Mr. Chairman, I think I may be permitted to say, in the Committee on State Prisons as to the necessity of a change in the present management of our penal institutions. As gentlemen of this committee are aware, the supervision of those institutions, by the Constitution of 1846, is committed to a board of three inspectors, who are elected by the people of the State, one every year, to hold office for a term of three years. It was considered by all the members of the committee on this subject that a radical change was necessary in the constitution of this central supervising power. Practically, sir, it is conceded that inspectors of State prisons are nominated by political conventions, generally at the end of the session, often when a large number of the representatives of the party constituting such convention, having finished the principal business which has called them together, have departed for their homes. The prevailing consideration which seems to have governed in the designation and nomination of those gentlemen has often, if not usually, been to balance up the nominations between different sections of the State; and the result has been, sir—I think I may say it, and speak within reasonable limits—the result has been that the State prisons, the penal and reformatory institutions of this State, have been committed to the general control, guidance and management of a board of second or third rate politicians, who have been put in office to reward them for political services, and who have possessed no knowledge of the duties which have been devolved upon them, and few of the requisites or qualifications for the discharge of those duties. I know, sir, that there have been honorable exceptions to this rule, but I think the observation of all who have observed this matter has taught them that those exceptions have been as rare as they have been honorable. This matter of the management of State prisons is a matter, as the chairman of the committee [Mr. Gould] has remarked this morning, which interests, deeply and largely, all the people of this State. It is not a mere question of economics; it is not a mere question whether the balance-sheet of the finances of the State prisons shall show a balance upon the side of the State or against it at the close of the year. It is a great question of morals, sir. It is a question that deeply and vitally affects the good order of society and the progress of civilization and morals in the State. As I said in the outset of my remarks, the committee differ only upon the question, how shall the central supervising power be organized? The majority of the committee has reported in favor of a single person to be denominated "the superintendent of State prisons," to whom shall be given the power which is described in the majority report. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen of the committee to the power which would be vested in this one man, if the report of the majority of the committee should be adopted. It will be seen that that one man will have the charge and superintendence of State prisons, with supervision and powers of visitation of all other places for the custody of persons charged with or convicted of crime. It will be seen that he shall appoint one warden for each State prison of the State, that he shall appoint a clerk—I am mistaken in respect to the appointment of the warden—but that he shall recommend to the Governor a warden, and shall appoint a clerk, a chaplain, and a physician for each of the State prisons; that he shall possess such powers and perform such duties in respect to county jails, local or district penitentiaries, and other penal and reformatory institutions, as the Legislature shall by law prescribe. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the power which would thus be intrusted to this superintendent of State prisons, and that the responsibilities and the duties which would thus be devolved upon him are too great to be intrusted to or devolved upon any one individual. I believe that the committee were unanimous in the opinion that each of these State prisons should be under the control of a single head, and that that head should be the warden of the prison; and although the majority and the minority differ in their recommendation as to the mode of appointment of this warden, yet they agree substantially as to what his powers, his duties and his responsibilities shall be. This warden, sir, is, by either of these reports, to have the entire charge of his prison, including the enforcement of its discipline, and the appointment and removal of all his subordinate officers. When I say subordinate officers, I mean all those whose duties relate to the police of the prison. In that respect, sir, the committee agreed. The first question to which I desire to call the attention of this committee is, how shall these wardens, who are to possess this great, this weighty responsibility in respect to the management of these important institutions—how shall these high executive officers be appointed? The majority of the committee, sir, recommend that these wardens shall be appointed by a single superintendent. I ask the committee whether the parallel of such a power exists anywhere under the Constitution of this State, or of any other of which gentlemen have knowledge; where, a single individual, without the advice or consent of any consulting body, has the appointment of men whose powers and responsibilities are as great as those which are devolved upon the wardens of these several State prisons. Mr. Chairman, the principle which governs me in this matter is this: that each of these State prisons should be under the control of a single, responsible head. The chairman of the Committee on State Prisons, in the discussions of this question before that committee, as I presume he will do in the discussion of the question here, was fond of citing those whom he addressed to the example of the Albany penitentiary, an institution which stands out pre-eminent among similar institutions in the country, as an example of an efficient, wise and successful management. Now, sir, I desire to make that my example, so far certainly as its prudential, its financial management and its strictness of discipline are concerned. There is no institution in the country which excels it; and I desire that each of the State prisons of this State shall, so far as possible, be conducted upon similar principles and to like results; that each of the State prisons of this State should, if it were possible, be made to rank with the Albany penitentiary in efficiency and perfection of discipline and management; and for this purpose it is that I would have at the head of each of these institutions a man capable of enforcing such a management and such a discipline. The question is, How shall such a man be found? How shall he be selected? How shall he be appointed? How shall he be held to that responsibility which is necessary? And how shall he be suspended or removed from office if he prove incapable or unfit? The majority of the committee say that all that shall be done by a single superintendent. I say, sir, that, for the proper selection of the men who are to have the charge, each at the head of one of these State prisons, you require more than the wisdom of a single man. You require a body of councillors who shall have knowledge of these matters, and who shall be able wisely to make these selections. I have again fallen into error, Mr. Chairman, in assuming that these wardens are, by the majority report, to be appointed by the superintendent of State prisons; but what I have said applies equally to the mode of appointment which is provided by that report. The majority report provides that these wardens shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. My objection to that is this: that the Governor of this State is not supposed to have and cannot be supposed to have—

Mr. AXTELL—Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that the warden is to be appointed on the recommendation of the superintendent of prisons.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—Very good. It amounts to this, simply, that the warden of each of these prisons is to be designated or recommended by the superintendent of prisons; and that upon such recommendation he is to be appointed by the Governor by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. To that mode of appointment the objection that I was making applies with equal force as if he were appointed by the superintendent of State prisons directly and finally. The designation is intrusted to the superintendent of State prisons. The appointment is to be made by the Governor, and that appointment is to be approved and confirmed by the Senate. Now I say, sir, that that amounts to precisely the same thing as if the appointment was made by the superintendent of prisons, or else there is no advantage in the provision which the majority of this committee recommend. If the Governor and the Senate are to appoint whom they will, if they are to disregard the recommendation of the superintendent of prisons, then I say that the appointment is to be made by an authority which is not and which cannot be expected to have any knowledge of the subject to which its action relates. They have had no experience; the Governor of this State is not supposed to know who are the men who will make capable and efficient wardens of the State prisons. If the appointment is to be made by the superintendent of State prisons alone, and upon his own responsibility, that is, if the selection is to be made by him and it is to be merely confirmed by the Governor and the Senate, then the objection which I was making applies in full force, that you put that whole responsibility upon a single individual. Now, sir, there is a further objection. How and to whom are those wardens of the State prisons to be held responsible? The committee will please to bear in mind that both these plans contemplate that the warden of the prison shall be the one responsible head of it, shall have the sole management of it, subject to the supervision and advice of the central power, that he is to appoint all the officers who have to do with the police and discipline of the prison. How are these wardens to be suspended or removed in case of malfeasance or inefficiency in the discharge of their duties? The eighth section of the report of the majority or the committee provides that the superintendent of State prisons may suspend the wardens from office, and the Governor may remove them on the complaint of the superintendent, after having been furnished with a copy of the charges against them and after giving them an opportunity to be heard in their defense. They may then be suspended upon the single will of this superintendent of prisons; and they may be removed, and can be removed, only by the Governor, after a hearing by him upon written charges to be preferred by the superintendent of prisons. Mr. Chairman, I claim that powers, and duties and responsibilities as vast as these which by this article would be devolved upon this central power, are not to be discharged wisely, and efficiently, and well, by a single individual. This matter of the management and control and government and discipline of State prisons, is a great and leading branch of the science of morals. The whole question of the reform of criminals and the prevention of crime, is involved in the correct management of the penal institutions of the State. I ask whether there is to be found, and where there is to be found a single man—where is the man whom any member of this committee would name as the man upon whom should be devolved such powers and responsibilities as are involved in that office? Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been for a long time in the State of New York a voluntary association of learned, able and philanthropic gentlemen, under the name of the prison association of the State of New York. That association consists of such men as Wm. F. Allen, the present Comptroller of the State of New York, John T. Hoffman, the present mayor of the city of New York; Dr. Francis Lieber, the well known scholar and publicist, of New York city; Professor Theodore W. Dwight, a member of this Convention; the honorable gentleman from Columbia, the chairman of the Committee on State Prisons; Gaylord B. Hubbell, of Westchester county, some time since a member of the Legislature of this State, and devoting himself in that capacity with the utmost wisdom and enlightenment to the matter of the management and organization of the prisons of the State, and for some time a warden of the State prison at Sing Sing, and as I have repeatedly heard the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] say, among the most efficient, able and excellent wardens who ever held that office in the State of New York; Dr. John H. Griscom, one of the most celebrated and learned physicians and surgeons in the city of New York, and Rev. Dr. E. C. Wines, the secretary of the association; such men, sir, constitute that association. If I am not mistaken, the honorable gentleman from Ontario [Judge Folger] is also a member of that association. At any rate he has had to do with the perfecting of the plan which is recommended to us by the committee of that association. Now, sir, the gentlemen whose names I have just brought to the attention of this committee, as members of this association, were appointed some time during the last year a committee to prepare and submit to this Convention a memorial upon the subject of the organization and management of the State prisons. These gentlemen, it will be remembered, have devoted their time, their attention, their wisdom, and their benevolence to this subject. They were appointed a committee to prepare and submit to this Convention a memorial upon the subject. They did so, and submitted an article which will be found in document No. 146, commencing on the first page, as the article which they unanimously recommended to this Convention to be adopted for the organization and management of State prisons. With the permission of the committee I will read that article as it is offered there:

"There shall be a board of governors of prisons, who shall have the charge and superintendence of the State prisons, and power to appoint the wardens or principal keepers, the chaplains, clerks and physicians thereof, and the power of removing the officers above named, and the other officers in the same; but such removal shall be for cause; and the accused shall, in all cases, be entitled to be informed of the charges against him, and to be heard in his own defense. Such board shall also have the superintendence, with power of visitation, of all institutions for the reformation of juvenile delinquents and the prevention of crime. It shall consist of five persons, to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, who shall hold office for ten years, except that the persons first appointed shall, in such manner as the Legislature may direct, be so classified that the term of one of the persons so appointed, shall expire at the end of each two years during the first ten years. Any vacancies in office, afterward occurring, shall be filled in the same manner. They shall receive such compensation as shall be established by law."

The memorial recommending this article was signed by this entire committee, whose names I have read—I shall be corrected in that respect by the chairman of the Committee on Prisons if I am in error—It was, as I understand it, signed unanimously by this committee with the exception of Mayor Hoffman, who was absent from the city or from the meeting at which the memorial was signed, and he telegraphed to the committee or to a member of it who was at Albany, that he agreed to the article with the exception that he was opposed to any compensation being provided for this board, and that he would cheerfully sign the memorial if in that respect it should be altered as he recommended. That recommendation of Mr. Hoffman, that no compensation should be provided for this board, was concurred in, as I understand, by all the committee, and, sir, it will be found that the plan which I have submitted in the minority report embodies all the features of the article proposed by the committee of the prison association, with the feature recommended by Mayor Hoffman. It will be seen that the third section provides:

"Such board shall from time to time, elect one of their number secretary thereof, who shall perform such duties as the Legislature or the board shall prescribe, and shall receive such salary as the Legislature shall determine; the remaining members of the board shall receive no compensation other than reasonable traveling and other expenses, while engaged in the performance of official duties."

Mr. Chairman, I claim no credit whatever for the plan which I have submitted to this Convention, except the credit of having perceived the excellencies of that plan, and having embodied it in my report. Beyond that the credit is due to the gentlemen whose names I have read as members of the committee of the prison association. The article which I have reported differs from that submitted in the memorial, in the following particulars: It embodies the idea of service, by the board, without compensation other than expenses, and it provides for the designation by the board of one of their number as secretary, who shall receive a salary. I have also modified the article in respect to its arrangement, and in other unimportant particulars. It will be observed, perhaps, with some surprise by members of this committee that the honorable chairman of the Committee on State Prisons [Mr. Gould] is one of the committee of the prison association who devised the plan which is submitted by that association and substantially embodied in my report, and who signed the memorial which recommended the same to this Convention. I probably shall not err or commit any breach of courtesy in saying that my honorable friend, the chairman of the committee [Mr. Gould], has said to me on several occasions that he has never changed his mind in regard to the excellence of the plan thus proposed; that he still, as then, regards it, as the best possible plan, but that he has yielded his preference for that plan in favor of the one which he has here proposed upon the grounds of expediency, or, perhaps I should say, of practicability—that is to say, that while he believes the plan recommended by himself, in connection with the other members of the prison association, to be the best, he feared it would not be adopted by this Convention, and that he has therefore submitted to the Convention a plan as nearly like it as any which he believed likely to be adopted. I believe I correctly state the position of the gentleman in that respect.

Mr. GOULD—I will merely state that my own individual plan would devolve upon a single officer the whole supervision of the criminal administration of the State, to be aided in one department by a board of State prison inspectors, and in the other by a board of police inspectors. But inasmuch as the majority of the committee were, and I believe a majority of the Convention are, opposed to any such central power as that embracing both these departments, I was driven to the necessity of accepting a divided administration.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I am aware, sir, that the plan originally submitted by the gentleman in the Committee on Prisons embraced a proposition for a single head over district attorneys, county jails, State police, State prisons, and all. What I referred to was the gentleman's recommendation of the plan of the committee of the prison association, which I have embodied in the minority report. The gentleman has more than once said to me that in his opinion that was the best plan that could be devised.

Mr. GOULD—I meant the best plan in connection with the other, which I have just described.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—Sir, the gentleman speaks—and I take that to be the burden of his argument upon this question—of the necessity of unity of management in our State prisons. Now, sir, I claim that a proper unity of management is contained in the plan embraced in the minority report. I claim that the State prisons of this State, three in number, and which should be increased to six (the chairman of the committee [Mr. Gould] strongly urges that not less than three new ones should be established immediately); that each of these prisons is an institution by itself, separate and distinct from the others; that it has no connection whatever with any similar institution in the State; that these State prisons are not parts of a system; that they are separate and distinct, without connection with each other, either financially or in respect to discipline and management. My position is that each of these institutions should be put under a single responsible head; that unity of responsibility is best attained by the appointment of a single head to each institution, who shall be absolute in his sphere, having the appointment of all his subordinates; and that he shall be held to such responsibility by an authority capable of judging of the manner in which he performs his duties. Such is my position in regard to this question. In the first place, we need for the appointment of these wardens or heads of the several prisons a board which shall be enlightened, which shall be instructed, and which shall be experienced in regard to these matters, which shall be capable of selecting from among the candidates for these positions, or from among those who are not candidates, but who ought to be put in these positions, men of fit character and capacity for the discharge of the duties devolved upon them. For that purpose the committee of the prison association recommends a board of five members to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, who shall be appointed for ten years, the board to be classified, and one member to go out at the expiration of every two years. The further provision in regard to that board, contained in my report, is that the members shall serve without compensation, except their reasonable and necessary traveling and other expenses when in the actual discharge of their official duties. It may be said, sir, as it was said in regard to the proposed board of education, that men cannot be found who will devote themselves to the care of these important interests of the State without compensation other than such as is here provided. But, sir, I am authorized to say, that those men can be found, that such men stand ready to perform the service. The chairman of this committee [Mr. Gould] knows men, and can name them, who stand ready to assume these duties and to discharge them—men of the largest experience, of the utmost enlightenment upon these questions—men of philanthropy, of education upon all these questions and interests involved, who will serve with no compensation other than is here provided. There will be of course a bureau of prisons, to be established at the capital, a central office. There must be somebody whose whole time will be devoted to the charge of this office and the discharge of the duties connected with it. And that is provided for by the provision that the board shall designate one of their number as a secretary. This officer will be totus in illis, he will devote his whole time to this matter, and will receive such compensation as the Legislature shall determine. That compensation should be liberal, should be ample, and such as will secure and compensate the services of one of the best men in the State. But, sir, aside from that, aside from the services of the secretary thus to be designated, there will not be a large portion of the time of this board required in the discharge of their duties. It will be seen, sir, that their first duty will be to select their secretary and to establish his office at the capital. Then they will have to designate the wardens of the several prisons, and that is a very important duty. Their next duty will be to consult upon and devise such a system of discipline and management, such a system of employment and labor in these prisons as shall commend itself to their wisdom. These things having been accomplished, their whole duty is accomplished, with the exception of the visitation of the prisons during the year. These institutions are to be managed and the system administered by the wardens at the head of each of them, and all that will be required of this board will be to see that the wardens discharge their duties faithfully and well—that they fairly administer the system devised and prescribed by the board. It is expected, sir, and we are warranted in expecting, that the gentlemen who take this position at the hands of the Governor, would be such men as those who constitute the prison association—men like William F. Allen, Francis Lieber, John T. Hoffman, Theodore W. Dwight, John Stanton Gould, Gaylord B. Hubbell and John H. Griscom. The services of such men can be obtained for no compensation other than is provided in the minority report (and the moment that a salary is attached to the office, the appointment will be sought and obtained by place hunters and politicians). There are grave and important questions to be submitted to this central power. There is the question of the employment of convict labor, including the continuance or discontinuance of the contract system, the whole responsibility of the appointments, and the whole question of the discipline of the prisons; the great interests, too, of the State in the reformation of criminals and the prevention of crime, will be largely within the scope and purview of this board, or of this central power. I ask gentlemen whether they would devolve such responsibilities upon a single individual, or whether they would not rather intrust them to a board of wise and careful councillors? The fourth section of the report of the minority of the committee relates to the appointment of the warden, and the appointment by the wardens of their subordinates. I am not certain but that the provisions of this fourth section are rather matters for legislation than for constitutional provision. If so, I should be content to see it stricken out. The point which with me is essential and important is this, that the central supervisory management and power over the prisons and penal institutions of the State should be properly organized, and that power being properly organized, I should be content to leave it to the Legislature to prescribe their powers and duties, and the powers and duties of those officers who shall be appointed by them. With these remarks as an introduction to the report of the minority of the committee upon this question, which I have moved as an amendment, I yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN—Will the gentleman inform the Chair whether he moves the whole article as a substitute?

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—My motion was to substitute the first and second sections of the minority report for the first section of the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. GOULD—In view of the small number of delegates present, I move that the committee do now rise and report progress.

SEVERAL DELEGATES—No, no.

Mr. GOULD—Then I withdraw the motion if it is not considered desirable that we do now rise. The theory of the majority of the Committee on State Prisons is, that all the beneficent intentions of the State in the establishment of our prisons will be best promoted by committing their custody and government to a single person, carefully and intelligently selected, with reference to his ability for the discharge of the duties of his position, to be aided by the advice of a competent board of local assistants. The theory of the minority is that these functions can be and will be better performed by a board of five persons. The questions before the Convention, then, are, 1. Ought any changes to be made in the existing system under the present Constitution? 2. If such change ought to be made, which is the wiser plan of making it? Shall the idea which underlies the report of the majority, or that which is contained in the report of the minority, be adopted and sanctioned by the Convention? These are the distinct issues presented for the consideration of the Convention, and they are those which I propose to consider. Every argument rests upon postulates. There must be some common ground of agreement between the parties or argument can issue in no profitable results. I assume, sir, in the full belief that it will be readily admitted on all sides: 1. That change for its own sake is always undesirable, and that the existing constitutional provisions respecting prisons should not be changed unless such change can be shown to be necessary. 2. The prisons should be penal in their character; they should be a terror to evil doers; they should be objects of dread to the criminal community. 3. They should be reformatory in their character—men should leave them better men than they were when they entered them. 4. They should be self-supporting. This condition is of course strictly subordinate to the other conditions, but when men who have been depredating unlawfully upon society for years are at length convicted, it would seem to be eminently just and right that they should be compelled at least to support themselves if not to repay some of the taxes which they have levied upon society. If these postulates are admitted, it will be necessary for us to inquire: 1. Whether the system established by the present Constitution does deter men from the commission of crime. 2. Whether it does have a tendency to make the prisoners better men—by enlightening their ignorance—by strengthening their wills so as to enable them to resist temptation, by purifying and elevating their affections? 3. Does it relieve the tax payer by making the prisons self-supporting—by the profitable employment of the men, by the faithful collection of the income, by the economical expenditure of the income, by the convenient arrangement of the interiors, and by the fidelity and vigilance of the officers? If these questions can be answered affirmatively with respect to the present system it ought to settle the question of its continuance. If on the contrary, we are compelled to answer them negatively, necessity is laid upon us, and as faithful public servants we are bound to devise some better system. I propose to consider these questions in detail, and, 1. To furnish an answer to the question whether our prisons as at present administered do really deter men from the commission of crime, and whether they are a terror to evil doers. We cannot adduce evidence on this subject from statistical tables, or to any great extent from official statements which are conclusive on the subject, yet, notwithstanding this deficiency, we are not left without pretty conclusive evidence which may safely guide our judgments to a correct conclusion. The very last report (1867) of the inspectors assures us that very many of the prisoners who are discharged, deliberately commit crimes in order that they may be sent back to prison. The food and raiment and shelter which they obtain there are so much more comfortable than that which they can obtain when at liberty that it outweighs, in their estimation, the restraints upon their liberty, and the enforced labor which are the incidents of their residence there. This testimony of the inspectors given during the present year is confirmed by much other evidence to be found in the pages of previous annual reports. The wardens, the chaplains and the physicians of those institutions concur with remarkable harmony in telling the same story.

Mr. FOLGER—Does the gentleman mean the State prisons or county jails?

Mr. GOULD—The State prisons.

Mr. FOLGER—I can understand how the fact could be so with reference to the county jails.

Mr. GOULD—In addition to the testimony afforded by these official documents we have the oral evidence of those ministers of the law whose positions enable them from the widest field of observation to form the most authentic and accurate conclusions upon the question. Sir, I have sought diligently for the opinions of our criminal judges, district attorneys, chiefs of police and sheriffs upon this matter, and I can assert with the utmost confidence that they do not believe that our prisons do deter men from the commission of crime. They answer me, and they will answer you if you ask them, that the criminal thinks nothing of his punishment when he is planning his nefarious act. If he can only get the jewels, the plate, the cash or the bonds into his possession, he snaps his fingers at the punishment; the prospect of it will not have the weight of a feather in his mind when put into the balance with the eclat which his exploit will give him among his associates and the pecuniary profit that he reaps from it, and the rude and licentious orgies which that profit enables him to enjoy. Sir, every member of this Convention is a witness in this matter. There are several who have held the position of sheriff, and others who have held the office of district attorney. I ask each member to appeal to the testimony of his own consciousness, whether he has ever heard any strong expressions of dread of punishment in our State prisons? And if the answer is, as I suppose it must necessarily be, I think, in connection with the other evidence which has been adduced, we are entitled to conclude with a good degree of assurance that our prisons as now managed are not a terror to evil doers, and they do not act adequately in the repression of crime.

Mr. KINNEY—I would ask the gentleman if that is not more due to the courts which determine the penalties, than that the punishment is not severe enough.

Mr. GOULD—I think very likely that has something to do with it. At all events, the fact is such that the criminal population of the State do not dread the punishment or are not deterred by it from the commission of crime by any punishment which is inflicted. I now proceed to my second point, and I ask, do our prisons reform the prisoner? Does he come out of them a better or a worse man than he was when he entered them? This, sir, is a question in which the people of this State have a deep and abiding interest. We turn out every year one thousand convicts from our State prisons, and two thousand from our penitentiaries, and from sixty to eighty thousand from our common jails. It would be a great pecuniary advantage to the State if these men could be returned into its bosom to join the industrial classes upon which all its wealth depends. It would be a great moral gain if they came back to it "clothed and in their right minds," educating their children and training them up to virtue and to industry. Now, sir, I have read over carefully all the reports of successive boards of inspectors from the beginning, and I am unable to find any traces of evidence that these prisoners are really reformed except in a very few isolated instances. Nor am I able to find that any earnest, comprehensive scheme has been at any time adopted having this end in view. None of the successive boards who from time to time, have been invested with the government of our prisons, have made any resolute efforts to ascertain the facts upon which all theories for the improvement of character must be founded. They have attempted no clear analysis of human character, nor adequate investigation of the secret springs which control human conduct. In a word, there are none of the evidences of intelligence and zeal directed to the accomplishment of this most desirable end, which must be the basis of all success in this direction. What efforts are made to enlighten their ignorance? There is a chaplain appointed for each prison. In the prison at Sing Sing there are now upward of fourteen hundred convicts in confinement. A large proportion of these men are as wholly ignorant of religious truth as the heathen in Africa or in New Zealand, the only knowledge or conception that they have of heaven, or hell, or God, or Christ, is as objects of blasphemy. Now, sir, what are the facts in regard to the case? We judge of a building that it is not a mill if we find no water-wheel, no steam power, and no stones for grinding. And we say that the absence of machinery is sufficient evidence that it is not a mill. We say that a building cannot be a blacksmith shop if we find no bellows and no anvil in that shop. And, if we find in our State prisons that there is no machinery, no plan, no system whatever for the reformation of a prisoner, we can infer, pretty readily, that there will be no reformation there. Let us inquire into this matter. The prisoners go there, almost all of them, exceedingly ignorant and exceedingly debased. They have no idea of moral law or of any kind of law, except the law which is administered by the judge and the sheriff. They are in a state of almost Egyptian darkness. Why, sir, I have put the question to over four thousand prisoners whether they could read or not, and about half of them said they could read, and the other half admitted that they could neither read or write. I put the test to hundreds who said they could read, and a few of them certainly could read very well. And the test that I put was the simple phrase in the New Testament: "There went out, at the time of Cæsar Augustus, a decree that all the world should be taxed?" Not a third of these men were able to read that easily and fluently. They would stammer and they would spell a very considerable part of the words. And those who were able to read it, when I would ask them the question who was Cæsar Augustus, I do not think I met with twenty out of the four thousand who had any definite idea of who Cæsar Augustus was, whether he was a Greek, a Roman, an Englishman, an Hungarian, or an Irishman. I have frequently put the question as to what was meant by taxing. I recollect the answer of one young man, and it was this: "When a cove prigs a wipe and somebody else sees him and goes and tells him, that is taxing him with it." [Laughter.] That is the idea he had derived from that word; and that gives you something of an idea of the kind of information which is derived from the reading of those who actually pretend to read and write. You will see even that knowledge is of no effect in making them better men, or enabling them to perform the duties of society. Well, sir, their knowledge of morals and religion is still lower than this. I have frequently asked men whether they knew what God was. They generally said they did, but when I came to ask them in regard to the attributes of the Deity, I found their ideas exceedingly vague. One replied in answer to this question with entire gravity, "Oh, yes, I have often heard of him sir; he damns folks."

Mr. FOLGER—I would ask the gentleman [Mr. Gould] if that is different from the current theological ideas?

Mr. GOULD—I must refer the gentleman to the theologian.

Mr. FOLGER—I have heard that idea inculcated in the pulpit all my life.

Mr. GOULD—As another illustration, I will state that when I have asked men about Jesus Christ, the name has been familiar to them, and I have always understood from them that Jesus Christ was somebody that was good. I asked one man if he knew who Jesus Christ was, and he said "He was a very good man, sir." And I asked him "Where did he live, and what did he do?" He said, "Sir, I believe he was a Sandy Hook pilot, who had prayers in his cabin every Sunday." This is a fair sample of a very large number of the convicts; and to encounter this vast mass of Egyptian spiritual darkness we have just one man! Suppose the chaplain works steadily for twelve hours in the day, this will amount to 5,040 minutes in a week, which, divided among 1,400 men, amounts to three and a half minutes to each man in a week. The disproportion between means and ends, great as it appears from this statement, is in point of fact much greater. The chaplain is required to read all letters written by the prisoners to their friends and all that they receive from them. He writes the letters which are sent by the prisoners who are unable to write themselves, which will average six in a day. His superintendence of this correspondence takes about one-half of his time, which will reduce the amount of time that he can allot to each prisoner to one and three-quarter minutes per week. But this is not all. He is the custodian of the library, and gives out and receives on an average six hundred volumes a week. He takes them from the shelves, registers them in a book, checks them when returned, and re-arranges them on the shelves. There is an average of fifteen persons sick in the hospital, who require and receive special attentions and consolations of the chaplain; sometimes he remains for hours at the bedside of a dying man or a dying woman. Then he is expected to reply to letters of inquiry which are frequently addressed to the prison from other States and from foreign States respecting its methods, its discipline or its statistics. He is by statute directed to keep certain records, which he is required annually to arrange and tabulate for the Legislature. He must compose at least one sermon a week and attend the stated meetings of the ecclesiastical bodies to which he belongs. And, now, when he has discharged all these duties, how much time has he left for the spiritual instruction of each of these ignorant men? Does any one suppose that he will have more than half a minute in a week to devote to each prisoner? The provision for the intellectual instruction of the prisoner is as meager as that for his spiritual instruction. We are told in the eleventh annual report of the inspectors that, "after a thorough and close examination, in no single instance has there been a single case of the re-conviction of those who received the first rudiments of their education in the prisons." This, sir, is a most remarkable assertion. It embodies the experience of eleven years, and it establishes the fact that not one man who had been educated in the prisons had ever again been convicted of another crime. Might it not be reasonably supposed, if these boards were really in earnest, that, like Archimedes they would have cried Eureka, and that all their efforts and all their energies would have been directed to sowing broadcast the seeds which had yielded such precious fruit? But we look in vain, sir, for any such activity on their part. The machinery in operation before this discovery was made was not increased in its amount or quickened in its activity. What was that machinery? Why, all the opportunity the prisoner had to acquire an education was in his cell; the lights are placed in the corridors, it was dim and flickering in the cells located nearest to them, but in those which were most remote, it was very difficult, even for the sharpest vision, to discern the letters of the spelling book. And all the direct instruction that they receive from an instructor does not exceed twenty minutes in a week. If we inquire what plans have been adopted for strengthening the volitions of the prisoners, so as to aid them to resist the temptations to relapse into crime when they shall return again into the world, we are compelled to answer that there are no plans, and no distinct, intelligent efforts to effect this object. If we ask what measures are taken to purify and elevate the tastes and the affections of the prisoners, the same answer must be made. Nothing more is done to accomplish these most important ends in our prisons than there is in our stables and our piggeries. The inspectors, in their report in the year 1846, state expressly that the prisons are "not adapted for reformation." The eighteenth annual report of the inspectors (1866) contains the report of Rev. Mr. Ives, the chaplain of Auburn prison, in which he says: "In my opinion, very many more might be thoroughly reformed if the prison was conducted on a somewhat different principle." In another part of the report he says: "Young men and boys being placed to work, march, and constantly associate with older men, who have become hardened in iniquity, and have, perhaps, spent a number of terms in prison, and even glory in their shame, their good resolutions have gradually given way, their hearts have grown hard, and they have gone out of prison schooled for crime." Let us now glance at the evidence furnished by our prison statistics. Incomplete and inconclusive as they are, they at least show positively that a large proportion of the prisoners are not reclaimed. In the year 1864, out of 579 persons who were sentenced to the State prisons, 143 were re-convictions, viz.: 114 were second convictions, 23 were third convictions, 4 were fourth convictions and 2 were fifth convictions. In 1865, 189 persons were sentenced to Sing Sing prison, of whom 42 were re-convictions, viz.: 30 were second convictions, 7 were third, and 5 were fourth convictions. In the same year, out of 457 persons sentenced to Auburn, 93 were re-convictions, viz.: 71 were second, 17 were third, 3 were fourth and 2 were fifth convictions. In the year 1866, 1,952 prisoners were committed to Sing Sing and Auburn prisons, of whom 232 had been previously convicted, viz.: 172 were committed a second, 38 a third, 15 a fourth, 7 a fifth time and upward. The aggregate of these figures shows 3,177 prisoners, of whom 510, or 16 per cent, were known to have been re-convicted. How many of the remainder have been convicted in other States or in prisons in our own State under different names, we have no means of knowing. Now, sir, in view of the very clear and convincing evidence which has been submitted, I can come to no other conclusion, and I believe the Convention can come to no other, than that our present prison system has miserably failed to exercise those reformatory influences which are so greatly to be desired, and which are so indispensable to the security and peace of society.

Mr. BARTO—I would ask the gentleman if the Rev. Mr. Ives, to whom he alludes, is the same gentleman who devotes a good deal of his time in making political stump speeches throughout the State.

Mr. GOULD—I have never heard of him in that connection.

Mr. BARTO—He certainly has been thus employed.

Mr. GOULD—He is a very talented gentleman, but I did not know that he was a stump speaker. He is an excellent preacher, and a very earnest christian.

Mr. BARTO—My idea is, that, had he devoted less time to stump speaking, he could have devoted more time to the prisoners.

Mr. GOULD—That follows, necessarily; I admit the conclusion of my friend. I pass on, now, to seek an answer to the third question which I have proposed, viz.: Whether our system relieves the tax payers by making the prisons self-supporting? I have already said that this matter is of far less consequence than the preceding. If any thing can be devised which will really inspire the criminal population of our State with a salutary dread of the penalty of imprisonment, and shall thoroughly reform those who have passed the ordeal of their discipline, the people will be quite willing to be taxed heavily for their support. But I believe, sir, that pecuniary success will always be a necessary incident of the working of any plan which will accomplish these results successfully. The very fact that prisons filled with young, strong, healthy men, cannot support themselves, is good enough evidence that they must fail in every other department. On the other hand, whenever prisons are made to yield a good revenue it is a good evidence that the training which alone will produe this result, has influenced beneficially, both the heads and the hearts of the prisoners. This board has been in full operation for twenty years. During this long period they have had an average of nineteen hundred men constantly under their control, which is surely long enough to show the real working of the system. Many of these men have been furnished with good capacities; some of them have been rich in special gifts, which if judiciously directed, as business men in private life would have directed them, would have yielded a large revenue to the State. Most of the prisoners have been in the very flower of their youth, and in the full vigor of their strength; they have been just in that condition where they were capable of earning the greatest amount of money.

Mr. GRAVES—I would ask the gentleman, from his acquaintance with prisons, has the reformation which has been attempted in the prisons, been conducted upon the law of kindness or by coercion?

Mr. GOULD—There has been no law—it has been a hap-hazard matter. There has been very little plan about it. Whatever plan there has been has depended very much upon the individual character of the prison at the time. It is of the want of plan that I complain. Now, these men have been committed for long periods of service, as will be seen by the official tables of the annual reports. Assuming that the term of life sentences is twenty years, it will be found that the average term of the sentences to the State prisons is five years, or more exactly, five and one-sixteenth years; this term greatly exceeds the average length of apprenticeships in the State. It is an undoubted fact, which I state without hazard of contradiction, that the average value of the services of these men is two-thirds of what is paid for similar services outside of the prison walls. Notwithstanding all these advantages the average amount received by the State for their services has only been fifty-nine cents per day. The very best men in the prison have only received seventy-five cents a day for doing exactly the same work that men outside were receiving three dollars a day for. The cash paid out of the treasury, and raised by the tax payers, for the support of our prisons over and above their earnings, for the past twenty years, was $2,215,099 43, divided among the separate prisons as follows: Auburn, $294,239.86; Sing Sing, $1,192,904.55; Clinton $727 955.02. The average annual cost to the State of each convict, over and above his earnings, has been sixty-eight dollars. The average annual cost of each convict at Auburn has been $21.32 over and above his earnings; at Sing Sing it has been $59 64; at Clinton it has been $88.13. It would be some relief if this large amount should be ascertained to be the result of errors and mistakes which occurred at the beginning of the system, but which had been rectified by subsequent good management. Precisely the reverse is true. Instead of improving by experience the financial management has grown worse and worse, and for the last three years the prisons have depleted the treasury to a greater extent than ever they did before. The amount reaches to three hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. BECKWITH—Has not the Clinton prison for a year or two past more than paid its way?

Mr. GOULD—Yes, sir; the inspectors so state. If it be alleged that this terrible deficiency in the earnings of the prisons arises from the inevitable necessities of the case, and not from mismanagement, the answer is ready—that no such inevitable necessity exists. The Albany penitentiary, with far inferior advantages, has yielded a net profit of $98,548.59, while our prisons yielded a net loss of $2,250,000.

Mr. GRAVES—Has not the cost of the support of the prisoners at the Albany penitentiary been defrayed by each county paying the board of the prisoners sent from the county?

Mr. GOULD—Not to any thing like the amount of difference shown. The counties pay an average of one dollar and twenty-five cents a week; but it must be remembered that a considerable proportion of the prisoners are committed for ten days, and they are of no benefit whatever, in a financial point of view, and they offset whatever gain there might be from the payment of the one dollar and twenty-five cents a week for prisoners from other counties.

Mr. GRAVES—They get that in addition to the labor of the prisoner.

Mr. GOULD—But it must be borne in mind that the greater portion of the prisoners are committed for not over three months. A man can hardly learn a trade so as to earn much during that time. While our prisons have been drawing increasing sums from the treasury, the penitentiary has been paying increasing sums into the treasury. While the management of our prisons has been growing worse and worse, the management of the penitentiary has been growing better and better. While our prisons have drawn from the treasury $300,000 a year, the penitentiary paid into the treasury, of net earnings, in 1864, $20,373.45; in 1865, $21,380.04; in 1866, $24,412.49. It cannot be said that our deficiencies have been compensated by superior treatment of the prisoners. Most of the members of this Convention have seen the penitentiary with their own eyes, and know that the prisoners are well clothed, fed and lodged, and that they are not taxed beyond their strength. The superior humanity of the system followed at the penitentiary is fully established by the statistical tables. The average number of deaths in the State prisons annually for the last twenty years is thirty-five, or one death to every fifty-five persons. During a similar period sixteen thousand seven hundred and seventy-four persons have been received into the penitentiary, of whom only seventy-four have died, which is less than one-half per cent of the whole number, or one in two hundred and twenty-seven.

Mr. FOLGER—Has the gentleman also made an average of the length of time during which the prisoners were incarcerated in the penitentiary? As some were only put in for five or ten days, they could hardly have time to get sick and die if they were put in in a state of health.

Mr. GOULD—The average is found in this way: the average number of persons in the penitentiary all through the year is taken, and the average number of persons in our State prisons. I do not see that it can make any difference in that way. Forty-three of these seventy-four deaths occurred in the single year 1866, when small pox and typhus fever were brought into the institution by the prisoners from Washington. Deducting these from the whole number, the remainder shows a ratio of deaths which is very small indeed, and which compares very remarkably with the ratio in the State prisons. I think that I have now demonstrated as clearly as it is possible to do, that the reply to all of the questions which have been propounded, must be in the negative. I have shown that our prisons do not exercise a restraining influence over the criminal population, that their action on the prisoners is not reformatory, and that their financial management has been most disastrous. In a word, the system inaugurated by the Constitution of 1846 has proved and entire failure and absolutely requires to be changed. I disclaim all intention to cast obloquy upon the individual inspectors, many of whom have been men of unblemished character and of very respectable attainments. Some of them, in my judgment, contained all the moral and intellectual elements which would fit them to shine as governors of prisons. The great failure is due to the faults of the system and not to the individuals who administered it. So long as the system is retained, the evils of which we complain will always be felt. This point I now propose to elucidate. 1. The mode of their selection is not well adapted to secure the services of the proper men. I speak to men who are familiar with political organizations and know how all these selections are made. They know better than I can tell them that the inspectors are selected by the State conventions of the political parties. I have used the word selected, but it is after all a misnomer, if not a satire, there is no selection in the proper sense of the word. How are our State conventions organized? The great mass of the people have neither part nor lot in the selection of the delegates. A few men gather at the primary meetings, and delegates who have their own private ends to serve procure their appointment from the meeting. The object of these men is to find out which is the strongest combination or clique and then identify themselves with that in order to found a claim upon the successful candidate for the spoils of office, in the shape of contracts, offices, and other unclean drippings from the party crib. It is no part of their design to nominate men who will fill the offices for the benefit of the people. They do not know and they do not care whether the nominees are men who are adapted by their peculiar organization or special training or moral worth to benefit the people in the administration of their respective offices. What they desire is that they shall be puppets whose wires they themselves can pull; that they shall be such as will use the offices for their own profit and their own aggrandizement. One man nominated under these influences, and with these objects in view, is offered for the suffrages of the people by each political party. The people do not know either of the men; they know nothing of their qualifications; they may be honest men or rogues; they may be men of abilities or dunces; they may have special adaptation for the management of prisons, or may be totally devoid of it; the people have no knowledge upon the subject one way or the other, and they have no means of acquiring it. In the conventions of both parties the nomination of State prison inspectors is always the last which is made; it is generally made late in the evening, when all the members are wearied with their labors, and when many have departed for their homes. If there has been a severe strife for the offices at the head of the ticket, the friends of the successful candidates naturally desire to heal the sores of the defeated party by selecting candidates from their ranks, and this is very commonly done by giving them the candidate for prison inspector, thus making this important office a mere makeweight in the scale of the candidates at the head of the ticket, and without any reference to his qualifications whatever. Or, if there has been no strife, then, when the nomination of these officers come up, the convention, decimated by the departure of its members, and those who remain having their interest in the work satiated by the disposal of the offices in which they have the greatest concern, or wearied out with the protracted length of the session, are in no situation to judge wisely or usefully in this matter. The result in practice is that the prison contractors and their agents, skillfully posted around, shout simultaneously, under the guidance of their leader, for some man who has been agreed upon among them, and the wearied members, mistaking the buzz of these interested parties for the voice of popular favor listlessly give their votes for him, though they care nothing about the necessary qualifications for the office and know nothing about the man. Sir, under these circumstances, there is no such thing as a deliberate and careful selection of the inspectors of prisons; there is no careful scrutiny into their character or their abilities. Those who have objections to their appointment have no means of presenting those objections, or if they do, the tribunal that is to judge them have neither the time nor the inclination to weigh them with the care and attention which they demand. I ask, most respectfully, whether it is not compatible with the profoundest respect for the people to deny that they are the most proper body to select these officers, about whose qualifications they are utterly ignorant? I would ask those gentlemen who are the greatest sticklers for the rights of the people upon this floor, whether they believe that more than one-tenth of the voters know any thing whatever about the candidates for this office, or whether more than one-tenth of this tenth have any means at their disposal of judging intelligently between the two candidates that are presented for their suffrages? I would ask finally, whether one-tenth of the members of this Convention can rise to-day in their places and give the names of the persons presented to the electors of this State for this office at the last election? Now, sir, if it is the case that the people do act and vote in entire ignorance of the qualifications of these candidates, that they know so little and care so little about the matter that they do not even remember the names of the candidates a week after they have voted for them, ought we not, as grave and honest men, to decide at once that the system of selection prescribed by the Constitution of 1846, is a bad one; that its practical working has been injurious to the people of the State, and that it ought forthwith to be changed. None of these difficulties would arise in an appointment of these officers by the Governor. The nomination would be made calmly and deliberately, after due inquiry and investigation; every one who objected to a nominee would have a full opportunity to state the reasons for his objection. The Governor would thus have the most fitting men in the State brought before him, a thoroughly intelligent selection could be made, and the Senators from every portion of the State could approve it or reject it. Surely, sir, no rational or impartial man can doubt for a single moment that this method is far more likely to secure good and able men than the other. Again, we must not forget that the Governor and Senate are elected by the people and are the servants of the people, as much as the delegates to a State convention; but unlike the latter, they act under the solemnity of an oath, and are responsible for their acts. Their action is on record and the individual share of each man in the appointment can be distinctly traced. This responsibility cannot be thus brought home to the delegates to State conventions; and in my judgment, this responsibility makes them much safer depositaries of the power of appointment. 2. Another strong objection to the present mode of appointment is, that the inspectors are, in spite of themselves, governed more by political considerations than the real welfare of the prisons, the prisoners, or society at large. They know that they are indebted for their nomination and their election to a certain clique, and they feel bound when they are elected to promote their interests. While human nature remains as it is nothing else can be expected. No branch of the public service requires experience for its successful performance so much as the subordinate officers of our prisons. Every year of service increases their value in a constantly increasing ratio. Yet in spite of their faithful performance of their duties, and in spite of the richness of their experience, they are liable to be turned out into the world to make way for new and untried men at every revolution of the political wheel. Few men in the State have had greater practical experience in the management of our prisons than Mr. Hubbell, as a contractor and as a warden, and few have studied the problems of prison management with more assiduity and success. In his report to the inspectors in 1864 he uses this significant language:

"Among the officers appointed by either party some will prove the right men for the positions in which they are placed; and when they have been so proved, whatever the folly of the political die, I would have them returned. The chances are four or five to one that the successors of such men will not be as good. Then why take the chances? Why, for mere party purposes, sport with the bodies and the souls of men, tamper with important interests of society, and risk the disorganization in a few days of systems of improvement and reform which it has taken as many months to construct? I would respectfully request your attention to the unhappy effects of these sweeping removals from office, upon prison discipline. I think it would be a great incentive to the faithful performance of duty if few officers were removed without a definite prospect in each case of doing better by the change; if proved fitness and efficiency might be regarded to some extent as the tenure by which their positions are held; and if those who would take the pains to introduce improvements might be reasonably certain of an opportunity to foster their growth. He reaps but little fruit who can only water his plant until it begins to blossom, and then must leave it to wither and die."

Thomas Kirkpatrick, the warden of Auburn prison, in his report to the inspectors in 1861, expresses himself nearly to the same effect on the injurious influence of politics on the proper management of the prisons. Mr. Hubbell, in a debate in the Assembly of the State in the year 1859, spoke as follows:

"During the last year our prisons have been managed by three inspectors, one from each political party, and, instead of coming together and arranging plans by which to manage the prisons to the best advantage, it would seem that each one has acted on his own account, and the prisons have been a bone for small politicians to contend about. These three inspectors have a plan by which each of them have charge of a prison for three months, and are called "inspectors in charge," and as such have full control of the prison assigned them. The democrat no sooner takes charge of his prison than he is beset by numerous political friends, who urge their own claims or the claims of friends; and it seems he considers it his duty or privilege, or both, to turn out of office as many officers as he pleases, who differ with him in politics, and replace them with some of his own stripe. The American inspector takes charge of his prison, and by way of retaliation, and to please his friends, turns out just whom he pleases, in order to make room for his friends. The republican, perhaps, mourns over the deplorable state of things, and says he would like to reform, but as 'to the victors belong the spoils,' and as it has become fashionable to run these prisons as political machines, he concludes that he must follow the example set him, and therefore his prison must pass through the same ordeal. And what confusion is created! The forms of proceeding adopted by the inspector in charge are very simple. Political friends surround him, and he is directed who to remove and who to appoint. Thus all he has to do is to direct a note to the officer he intends to remove, with the simple words, 'Sir, your services are no longer required.' No explanation is given, no matter how faithful, or with how much skill he has performed his duties; no matter how valuable he may be as a man and a citizen; no matter about the time of year; no matter how poor and needy his family may be; no appeals from a sick wife or starving children will avail if the officer has committed the unpardonable sin of voting as he pleased—he must leave, his situation is wanted for some more faithful and obedient political friend of the inspector in charge, or of his friend's friend, down to the fourth degree. How humiliating to think that even our State prisons must be made to bend, warp and tremble at the bidding of miserable pot-house politicians."

"From this cause our prisons are made to suffer greatly. So fashionable has it become to remove officers, that some of the inspectors have a few favorite friends whom they take with them from prison to prison as often as they change themselves. These inspectors change prisons every three months, and by this means the management of each prison is virtually changed every three months."

I have seen at Sing Sing, with my own eyes, at one time that almost every one of the subordinate officers was taken from the class called "roughs"—they had been keepers of gambling houses or drinking saloons, they were debauchees, profane swearers and drinking men. Are men like this adapted to reform the prisoners? Now, in the face of all this testimony, can we say that the system established by the present Constitution works well, and that politics are not an inseparable obstacle to their successful management? If you think the evils I have described ought to be removed, there is no way of doing any thing to cure them unless you make a radical change in the system that gives birth to them. 3. The absence of personal responsibility is a great cause of the existing evils in our prison system, and this irresponsibility is inherent in the very nature of a board. "Boards make screens," was a wise remark of Jeremy Bentham's; it sums up the history of all experience before his time, and has been confirmed by all the experience of mankind since he uttered the maxim. Permanent boards are irresponsible enough, but evanescent boards, in which one member drops out every year, and a new member comes in, carry irresponsibility to a maximum extent. If you ask any of the inspectors why the prisons are ill ventilated, or why the shops are inconveniently arranged, or why unwholesome food is fed to the prisoners, or why improper subordinate officers are allowed to remain in prison, the answer is that he has nothing to do with it, that he wished it were otherwise, but he has been overruled by his associates, and it is very possible that he speaks truly in relation to the particular grievance that you bring to his notice. If you ask another inspector he answers, and answers truly, that he desired to have it amended but was overruled by the majority. And just so will be the true answer of the third inspector if you address your inquiries to him. From the very nature of the case there can be no congruity in the plans formed by an evanescent board. Two out of three agree upon a plan of ventilation—on the question of heating, the minority in the former case combines with one of the majority and they adopt their plan of warming the prison. The consequence is that the plans of ventilation and heating are unharmonious, neither works well; whereas if they had been parts of the same plan both would have answered the purpose. The inspectors enter upon their duties in many cases, seeing the interior of a prison for the first time in their lives. They have never studied the subject of prison discipline and are ignorant of every thing that they are called upon to decide. They find two gentlemen associated with them, one of whom has been one year and the other two years in office who entered upon their duties as ignorant as himself. Thus by the operation of our present system we have a board which, in the language of scripture, is "ever learning but never coming to a knowledge of the truth." As soon as one of them begins to grasp the problems which he has to solve, his term of office expires and he gives place to a successor, who goes through the same routine that he has gone through. The human mind is governed by laws which are above and beyond the reach of all human legislation, and even of human volition, and there can be no successful result if those laws are violated. There will be no effort without an adequate motive. What sane merchant or manufacturer would expect to increase the efficiency of his clerks or of his artisans by taking away from them all motives to exert themselves for his benefit? Yet this is precisely what the State does with its prison inspectors. It pays them the same salary for neglecting their work, as it does for performing it faithfully and successfully. The man who exerts himself to the utmost, is no more likely to be re-elected than is his colleague who pays no attention whatever to his duties. One of the greatest stimulants to exertion is honor and renown. The officer who exposes his life upon the battle-field, may not undervalue his pay and rations: he will doubtless expect them and demand them, but, after all, they do not nerve his arm for the shock of the battle. They are not the inducements which take him from his home and friends to peril his life in the field. It is that he may place himself in some honorable niche among the heroes of his country, that his name may be embalmed in his country's songs, that future generations may be taught to lisp his name with reverence. These are the motives which induce him to suffer peril and privation, and in their absence the race of heroes would never have existed. Now, what honor or renown can accrue to the members of a board? If one of them forms a plan with infinite study, and executes it with the most perfect ingenuity, nobody ever hears of it, or if they do, they give the credit of it to the board, and not to him. This impersonal being swallows up all the honor which results from the successful performance of prison duty. Who knows the individuals that compose a board? What member of the Convention can tell the names of the present inspectors? Who can tell who constituted it six years ago? I doubt whether there are fifty persons out of the four millions in this State who can answer the question. As the impersonal board absorbs all the credit of the good deeds of its members, so it conceals effectually all their faults. It takes away this most important and operative security for good conduct. These views are not merely the statement of a theory—they express a positive fact. As evidence of the real injury to the interests of the State arising from this source, I give a few examples, taken almost at random from the official reports of the inspectors, of the culpable laxity in the administration of these institutions. In the report of the inspectors for the year 1844 we are told that, upon the incoming of a new board, they felt it to be their duty to make an actual count of the prisoners in the prison at Sing Sing. The books showed that there were seven hundred and ninety-five men confined there, but on actually counting them it was found there were only seven hundred and sixty-two in the cells. The books showed that there were one hundred and two women in the prison, but on counting them only eighty could be found. The new board made every effort to find out what had become of the fifty-five prisoners who had thus slipped through their fingers, but the most energetic inquiries failed to throw any light upon the matter, and no clue to the missing prisoners was ever found. On inquiry, it was found that no comparison between the number on the books and the number actually present in the cells had been made for five years. Each of the old board of inspectors said he supposed that some of his colleagues had attended to the matter, and he himself had given himself no concern about it. One of the convicts claimed that his time had expired. His name could not be found upon the register, nor could any record whatever be found of his commitment. From all that appeared upon the records or files he had been a volunteer prisoner for five years. Another prisoner also claimed that his time had expired. His name was not on the register, but when at length the original commitment was found among the files, it appeared that he had been kept in prison a long time beyond his sentence. Learning that no thorough search of the cells had been made for a long time, the inspectors directed one of the keepers to make one. From his report it appears that he found concealed in them, pocket knives, shoe knives, stone hammers, shoe hammers, alcohol, awls, scissors, nails, spikes, files, flint and steel, tinder box, chisels, obscene books, Burglar's Companion (book), tobacco, pipes and matches. The warden said he had not been ordered to search the cells, and the inspectors thought he would have searched them without orders, and thus between them this magazine of dangerous articles was suffered to accumulate without observation. The inspectors found from the books that the prison was over $50,000 in debt, and afterward they were referred by a former agent to a pocket book in one of the pigeon holes, which showed a large amount of indebtedness that did not appear upon the books. The books of the prison were found to differ from those of the Comptroller $20,000 in the aggregate and in the balance about $12,000. There was a large amount of debt due to the prison reaching to $89,850, some of which was of fifteen years' standing, and no efficient means had been adopted to collect it. What discrepancies have occurred since that time we have had no means of knowing. Contracts have been made so loosely that the advantage has in all cases been on the side of the contractor to the great loss of the State. Mr. Kirkpatrick, the warden of Auburn prison, tells us in the report for 1861 that the whole number of days' labor performed under four contracts in one year was 72,454½ days, which, at the contract price as drawn, amounted to $30,008. The same number of days' labor under their own bid amounts to $37,879, showing a loss in each year of $8,727, or in five years, the term of the contract, of $43,637. What was the amount of loss on the remaining contracts we are not informed. It will be observed that the contract as drawn binds the contractors to pay less than they actually offered to pay in their bids. This is done in consequence of the inexperience and the irresponsibility of the inspectors. The latter, under ambiguous phrases in the wording of the contracts, diminish their obligations to the State, prompted thereto by the pressure of a strong motive. The inpectors, in the absence of such motives, suffer themselves to fall blindfold into the trap so ingeniously set for them. The wording of many of these contracts is such that, though on a careless reading the discrepancy between the bid and the contract is not observed, yet, when the attention is specially directed to it, the meaning of the contract is too plain to be controverted. In other cases, the meaning is more latent, and these lead to litigation which is enormously expensive to the State, and in almost every case it has been unsuccessful, owing to the careless manner in which the inspectors have defended its interests. A very large number of cases have arisen in this way, as, for example, the case of Mr. Kingsland, where the State lost $53,000, without recovering interest. From the report of 1865, we learn that Mr. Chichester sued the State for damage for non-performance of contract in the year 1840. Judgment was given in his favor. The supreme court affirmed it. The court of errors reversed it in 1842–3. The case was tried again in 1846, when he died. In 1863, his executors obtained leave of the court to revive and continue the action, and was still on trial in 1866, before Judge Gould, of Troy, as sole referee. The witnesses on behalf of the State are nearly all dead, and it is almost impossible to defend the case successfully. These few examples, mere bricks from Babylon, will serve to show the Convention how loss and disaster invariably follow in the wake of divided, and therefore of irresponsible control. It is impossible to tell who is in fault for all these losses, mistakes and blunders. The men who were in office when these claims against the prison accrued have been long out of office; in the multitude of their private affairs they have forgotten about the circumstances; no one knows how or when the evil occurred; generally, the first intimation that the people have had that these losses have been incurred has been in the report of men who have been the successors of the men by whose fault it happened. The inspectors themselves say in their twelfth report: "It occurs to us that one of the greatest defects in our prison system lies in the want of a more direct personal accountability and an immediate individual responsibility of the principal officers." 'A responsibility is involved, but it is mixed and divided, and not that direct individual responsibility that there would be if a single inspector were steadily in charge of the same prison, and that for the management of such prison he alone stood accountable to the laws and the public. We have known an assistant keeper who, when put into a difficult shop and the responsibility of governing it devolved upon him alone, immediately took rank as a first-class officer—and thus because power to do so and direct personal responsibility were so joined together as to admit of no shirking." The evils arising out of the irresponsibility of boards are strikingly shown in the structure of the buildings; they are inconvenient in their arrangement, and lack permanence and strength. Mr. Hubbell, of Sing Sing, says in his report: "The workshops seem to have been located without any regard to good order or foresight as to future uses of the ground. Some of the kinds of business established have proved illy adapted to the employment of prisoners. Some of the shops have been altered and enlarged to meet the temporary wants of contractors, regardless of expense which the State must incur in consequence of the employment of extra keepers. The buildings generally cover so much ground, and the men are so scattered, that it is impossible to keep the expense of guarding them within reasonable limits. Our guard posts cover an extent of not less than forty acres." I have now shown by the citation of unquestioned examples, proofs and the arguments and conclusions of the most experienced men, that the irresponsibility incident to the very nature of an executive board has worked great disaster to the people and to the prisoners, involving injury to their moral, material and financial interests. Let me ask if this result might not have been predicted from the general experience of mankind in all analogous cases? Does a merchant ever commit the command of a ship to a board of captains? Does a nation ever commit the command of an army to a board of generals? Does a manufacturer ever commit the management of his manufactory to a board of superintendents? Is it not shown by the universal sense of mankind that when uniformity of plan and unity of action is a prerequisite of success, a single head is immeasurably superior to many heads? And if this is so, can we as reasonable men suppose that the management of our complicated system of prison discipline is an exception to the universal rule? If you will place the prisons under the control of one man who understands his business, and who is really responsible for all that is done, your contracts will be drawn so that they will not lead to constant litigation; the contractors will not pay less than the amount of their bids for the services of the men they hire. The buildings will be made to conform to some convenient plan by which the services of a large number of the present guards and under-keepers can be dispensed with, and the heavy drain which has been made upon the treasury will at length be stopped. Can this Convention, as faithful servants of the people, do less than this? Hitherto I have argued these questions on the hypothesis that they are are to be conducted in the future as they have been in the past. But, sir, we are called upon by every motive which can act upon us as men, as Christians, as politicians and as statesmen, to inaugurate a new system, which elsewhere has been crowned with very great success, and which I am fully persuaded would prove as successful here as it has been in Europe. If we do so, all the reasons which I have offered for a single head, and for the unity of action, and the complete responsibility which springs from it, will be found to be increased in force in a tenfold proportion. Before I proceed to give an outline of the new system of prison discipline, which I hope ere long to see adopted here, allow me to state for a moment the origin and progress of our present system, which I believe is known to very few of even the statesmen of New York, and which is a terra incognita to the great mass of our people. Previous to the administration of Governor Jay, thieves, counterfeiters and such like depredators were punished by whippings at the whipping-post or at the cart's tail, by branding on the cheek or hand with a hot iron, by exposure in the pillory or the stocks, by cropping off the ears, by pecuniary fines, by imprisonment in the common jail, and by the gallows. In every case, however, imprisonment was the mode of punishment in combination with one or more of the punishments that I have enumerated; and hence it occupied a wider place in the public mind than any other mode of punishment. It gradually grew in the public mind as the true ideal of retributive justice. As population increased it was found that crime was increasing, and that property and life were growing less and less secure. This state of things was met from time to time by the Legislature, by making the class of crimes which seemed to be most prevalent capital offenses. This course was exceedingly offensive to the society of Friends, who then constituted a much larger portion of the population than they do at present, and with whose religious principles the death penalty was directly in conflict. This religious body were united to a man upon this point, and they were all strenuously exerting themselves to devise some means which, without sacrificing the life of the offender, should have the effect of diminishing the amount of crime which they were compelled to acknowledge was increasing with fearful rapidity. Two of the wealthy and intelligent members of this body signalized themselves by their assiduous study of these questions. Thomas Eddy and John Murray patiently studied the records of the criminal courts, conferred with judges, justices of the peace, sheriffs, and other officers charged with the enforcement of the criminal law. They visited the criminals in the jails, saw with their own eyes their daily occupation, heard with their own ears their daily conversation, and in this way they were enabled to take the gauge and mensuration of crime, its causes and its consequences, to an extent which had never been reached before. The statistical results of these examinations showed them, and enabled them to convince others that the death penalty, which was apparently so terrible, was totally inefficacious in repressing crime. They found that crime increased in proportion to the frequency of public executions, that these spectacles actually hardened men's hearts and steeled them to the commission of deeds of criminal hardihood, that the whippings and burnings and croppings and exposures in the pillory and the stocks, not only had the same effect upon the general public, but that they brutalized the victim and only prepared the way by which a petty thief became a burglar, and a burglar became a murderer. They found, too, that the common jails were nurseries of crime, that the very worst classes of society were huddled together, without instruction, to while away the time with cards and drink, and licentious conversation, the adepts in crime teaching the young all the more advanced arts of the burglar and the assassin, and that mutual corruption was the only result of the system as then carried on in the State. They reasoned that a great amount of the crime so much complained of arose from idle habits and loose associations, and that the most natural way of meeting the difficulty was to enforce habits of industry and thrift as a part of the punishment inflicted on the criminal, and they very reasonably argued that while engaged in the performance of these tasks they could not indulge in those evil communications which had been found by experience to be so corrupting to good manners. Thomas Eddy, though insignificant in his personal appearance, was a man of remarkably enlarged and statesmanlike views, and although a very modest man and retiring in his manners, he possessed an extraordinary power over the minds of those with whom he was brought in contact. He was one of the most trusted friends, and most reliable advisers of De Witt Clinton, during the long and arduous struggle in which he was engaged while initiating and constructing the canals, and Edward Livingston was indebted to him for the germs of that grand scheme of prison discipline which he so eloquently elaborated in his celebrated report to the Legislature of Louisiana. Mr. Eddy was untiring in his efforts to leaven the public mind with his views of prison discipline. He visited nearly every influential man in the State, explaining to them the actual condition of affairs, combatting their objections and sustaining his own ideas with the natural eloquence that belonged to him. At length the public mind became ripe for action, and in the year 1796 the Legislature passed an act drawn with great care, embodying the views of Messrs. Eddy and Murray, and which made a very great and important change in the criminal code. By its provisions all the provisions of previous laws, annexing the penalty of death to crimes, except for treason and murder, and aiding or abetting the same, were repealed. All other felonies were to be punished by a term in the State prison not exceeding fourteen years, either at hard labor or in solitude, or both. Deodands were abolished. Whipping and all other cruel punishments were henceforth forbidden. Petit larceny, buying or receiving stolen goods, were to be punished by fine or imprisonment in the State prison not exceeding one year, or both. For the second offense the imprisonment might be extended to three years. John Watts, Mathew Clarkson, Isaac Stoutenburgh, Thomas Eddy and John Murray, Jr., were appointed to select a lot in the city of New York, not exceeding two acres, for the site of a State prison; and Philip Schuyler, Abraham Ten Broeck, David Hall, Jeremiah Van-Rensselaer and Teunis Van Vechten were appointed to select a site of four acres for a similar purpose, in the city of Albany. After the purchase of suitable sites, the commissioners were authorized to build a prison in New York and in Albany, on such plan as they might deem advisable—$25,000 being appropriated to the New York prison, and $20,000 for the prison at Albany. The person administering the government, with the advice and consent of the council of appointment, may from time to time appoint not exceeding seven inspectors, for each prison, who are to meet at the prison once in each month or oftener, and they are empowered to make all needful rules in conjunction with the judges of the supreme court for the government of the prison not inconsistent with the Constitution and the laws of the State. The Governor and council of appointment were to appoint a keeper who, if possible, was to understand some mechanical trade, and was to be allowed £350 as a salary. The keeper appointed his own assistants, subject to the approbation of the inspectors. The keeper was authorized to punish refractory convicts by confinement in solitary cells on bread and water, as long as the visiting inspector should determine. The prisoners were to be habited in coarse clothing, and to be fed on coarse food at the discretion of the inspectors; and were to be kept at hard labor, so far as might be consistent with their health and sex. This act was approved by Governor John Jay, March 26, 1796. It was a step in the right direction, but as experience has abundantly shown, it did not go far enough. Their whole reliance was on the cultivation of habits of industry on the part of the prisoners, they did not think of the evils arising from association during the night, of the necessity of instructing their ignorance, and of supplying them with adequate motives to good conduct. At the next session of the Legislature the authority to build a prison in Albany was suspended, and was never afterward renewed. The prison at New York was built, and converted into a great manufactory. It was found to be a great improvement upon the old system, but great and glaring defects were soon found to develop themselves, which prevented it from realizing the ideal of its projectors. Escapes were frequent. The free intercourse of the prisoners during the night was corrupting in its tendency; the old ones had a most injurious influence over the neophytes in crime, and the opportunities which unrestrained intercourse among the prisoners during the night gave them to conspire among themselves, was most injurious to the discipline of the prison. It labored under great pecuniary difficulties. The prison was compelled to purchase the tools and raw material for cash, while it was under the necessity of selling the manufactured articles on credit. One of the inspectors in rotation was on duty each week, and in consequence of this divided responsibility, many bad debts were made, and much money was lost. It had scarcely begun its operation before the hostility of the mechanics was violently excited against the prison. Shoemaking being the most profitable branch of labor, and there being the most steady demand for the products of that branch of industry, a large proportion of the prisoners were employed on it. The shoemakers of the State were so much excited by this circumstance that in 1804 the Legislature was compelled to pass an act restricting the inspectors from employing more than one-eighth of the prisoners in the business of shoemaking. The working of the New York State prison showed so many defects that the friends of prison discipline set themselves zealously at work to find out the causes of the difficulties which manifested themselves, and to apply adequate remedies. They thought the main obstacle to success was the nocturnal associations of the prisoners, and the remedy proposed was the entire isolation of the prisoners, but as they were well satisfied that solitary confinement must inevitably impair the mental faculties of the prisoners, they compromised the matter by arranging a plan by which the prisoners were to labor together in strict silence in the day-time, while they were confined in separate cells at night. Public sentiment in the course of a few years settled upon this plan with a good degree of unanimity, and on the twelfth of April, 1816, the Legislature passed an act empowering Elijah Miller, James Glover and John H. Beach, to purchase a site for a new prison in the village of Auburn, and to build a prison there on the general plan of the New York prison, but with such improvements as experience had suggested. Before beginning to build, the commissioners were required to submit their plans to the chancellor and judges of the supreme court and secure their approval or a majority of them. Fifty thousand dollars was appropriated for the purchase of the site and the commencement of the buildings. A week afterward an act was passed appointing James Bent, Peter W. Radcliffe and Thomas Taylor, commissioners to visit the State prison in New York, to inquire into its management, and whether any abuses existed there, they were also directed to visit the prisons in Pennsylvania, and report thereon. We have never been able to find the report of these gentlemen, but in the following year an act was passed which introduced sweeping changes into the old system, which were marked by a statesmanlike insight into the causes of the difficulties in prison management far in advance of the age, and which reflected the greatest honor upon its authors. The inspectors were required to contract for the rations and hospital stores with the lowest bidder. No more materials were to be bought to be worked up by the prisoners, but they were to be employed in working on stock which should be furnished for that purpose by outside customers, and the manufactured articles which had accumulated and were unsold were to be disposed of at public auction. A separate account was directed to be opened with each prisoner, in which he was to be charged with his food, clothing and hospital expenses, and giving him credit for the full amount of his earnings. As long as he strictly obeyed the rules of the prison and behaved himself in all respects in an exemplary manner, twenty per cent of his earnings were to be set apart for his benefit and invested in United States stock. The amount so set apart was to be paid to him on his discharge, or if he died during the term of his imprisonment it was to be paid to his heirs. When a prisoner who had been sentenced to not less than five years' imprisonment, had in all respects behaved well, and had acquired by the aforesaid means fifteen dollars or more per annum, his sentence was to be abridged one-fourth and was to receive the money to which he is entitled out of his earnings, but such money was to be forfeited by his misconduct or attempt to escape. The counties of Oswego, Oneida, Madison, Chenango and Broome, and all the counties west of these, were formed into a district which were to send their prisoners to Auburn, and until that prison was completed the canal commissioners were authorized to contract for the labor of the prisoners from these counties. Their services were not to be let for less than six months. I cannot find that these admirable provisions giving the prisoners a direct interest in the pecuniary success of the prisons, and enabling them to earn a remission of a part of their sentence by good behavior, was ever repealed: nor can I find that it was ever obeyed. It seems to have been ignored from the beginning as too grand an idea to be grasped by the intelligence of that age. In 1818 the Legislature took another step in advance by the recognition of the fact that insane persons were not the proper subjects of prison discipline, and by the enactment of a law authorizing their removal to a lunatic asylum. In 1819 the Legislature took a retrograde step, which was the cause of unspeakable evils. It enacted, for the first time in the prison history of New York, that the keepers might punish refractory prisoners by the infliction of not exceeding thirty-nine lashes, or they might be put in irons or in the stocks. But this was in some degree counterbalanced by the very valuable provision that the State prisoners should henceforth be confined in separate cells. In the ensuing year (1821) the Legislature took still another step backward. The dead bodies of convicts were granted to surgeons for dissection, and the keepers were authorized to deliver such bodies to the medical schools mentioned in the act, and for the first time it authorizes the letting of the services of prisoners to contractors. Now, sir, this step authorizing contractors to have the labor of our prisoners has been fraught with innumerable evils to the prisons of this State. It is the real cause why it is impossible to maintain any good and efficient discipline in our prisons. These contractors are authorised to send in their foremen, and it is a positive fact that in the prison shops of this State a great many persons from outside go in and work with the prisoners, and the result is that letters are constantly being carried in and out. One of the inspectors, Mr. Forrest, assured me that his last business was to discover a secret mail of this kind. A man had a pocket in the back of his vest, in which he continualy brought in and carried out letters to and from the prisoners. Mr. Forrest said that he was informed of the fact, and that he required the man to be searched. The man was perfectly willing to be searched, but when he took off his jacket and the pocket was found with six or seven letters in it, he had to give up. Sir, this is constantly being done. A few months ago, a light was seen in one of the prisons at night and on going in the watchman found the foreman of the prison there. He was there with a basket, and on inquiring of him what he was doing with the basket, he said that he was in there taking some things which belonged to his employer. The watchman thought it was a matter which should be reported to the warden, and he did so, and a thorough search was made, and then, in a closet, there was found gin, brandy, sardines, and all sorts of delicacies and luxuries, presenting a perfect pantry of a cook-shop. This mode was made use of for the purpose of stimulating the prisoners to over-labor. How can you expect, with that kind of thing in existence, that discipline can be maintained? It is certainly easier to maintain the financial arrangements of a prison by having the intervention of contractors, but it is perfectly possible to maintain them without contractors. We have already found that the Clinton prison can be carried on without the assistance of contractors. We have seen that in New Hampshire one man runs the prison. He supports it, and pays a very considerable sum into the State treasury from the labor of the prisoners, and there are no contractors whatever. There is no necessity for them. If we had a single head to our prisons, and could procure a good business man who could contrive plans and had a resolute purpose to make the prisons self-supporting, it could be done. But it never can be done with the conflict of opinions in a board where one man would wish to regulate the thing in one way and another in another. There must be but one regular, persistent plan, just as a merchant has in his own business, or we can never look for success without contractors. But, sir, there have been two improvements in the discipline of our prisons. This Legislature adopted some good provisions. The public mind had been excited considerably by abuses of the pardoning power, and in order to remedy the evil it enacted that no convict should be recommended for pardon who had not earned at least twenty-five cents per day for one year preceding the application, provided his health was not seriously impaired. They farther enacted a very wise provision, that the prisoners at Auburn should be divided into three classes under the direction of the inspectors — the first class was to consist of the oldest and most heinous offenders, who were to be kept entirely separate from all the rest, and be confined both day and night in solitary cells. The second class consisted of less heinous offenders, who were to be confined for three days in the week in solitary cells, and for three days in silent associated labor. The third class was to consist of the younger and less hardened class of offenders who were to be confined during the night in separate cells, but who were to be employed in silent associated labor every day in the week except Sundays. This law, so wise and so benevolent in its inception was never executed, it added very considerabiy to the labors of the officers, and as the inspectors did not trouble themselves about the enforcement of it, the keepers were quite willing to spare themselves the trouble of carrying it into execution. The complaints respecting pardons were not abated by the legislation of 1821, and in 1822 the Legislature passed an act requiring the judges to examine their notes of trials from time to time, and write opinions as to which prisoners should be recommended for pardon. Such opinions were to be filed in the office of the prison and to be furnished by the clerk of the prison to the Governor on application. This was found to involve a greater amount of labor than the judges could perform, and the provision, though never repealed, was suffered to fall into disuetude. The authority which had been granted to the keepers, to use the lash, and the admission of contractors and their agents into the prisons, had now began to manifest their legitimate results in producing a frightful amount of petty tyranny and revolting cruelty. Dark tales were in circulation how men had been driven to idiocy and insanity and suicide by a refinement of cruelty which would have been considered harsh, even in the city of Algiers. The Legislature therefore determined to institute an inquiry into these alleged abuses, and appointed Stephen Allen, Samuel M. Hopkins and George Tibbets, commissioners, who were required to visit the prisons at New York and Auburn to inquire into all their affairs, to compare their respective systems of discipline and to report to the Legislature such amendments of the law as they might deem necessary. I have not been able to find the report of this commission, but in the following year — 1824 — the same gentlemen were appointed to build a new prison at Sing Sing, and $70,000 was appropriated for the purpose. As this was the only important legislation on the subject during this session, I infer that this was the principal recommendation of the commissioners. As charges of great cruelty continued to be brought against the prison officers, the Legislature, in 1826, directed the commissioners for the building of the Sing Sing prison to visit Auburn and inquire into the abuses which were alleged to exist there, with respect to excessive flogging, and depriving the sick of hospital privileges. They were also specially charged with the duty of examining into certain cases of alleged improper conduct of the inspectors in trading with prisoners, and in corruptly appointing improper persons as officers. They were also directed to inquire into the causes of the death of Rachel Weecks, who had recently ied in the prison. I regret that I have been unable to find the report of these gentlemen; but I am very sure, from undoubted testimony, that much of the alleged cruelty was true, and that our prisons at that time, were literally "habitations of cruelty" and that the only effect of the discipline, was to convert bad men into absolutue demons. The prison at Sing Sing having been completed for the reception of prisoners in 1828, the commissioners were authorized to transfer the male prisoners from the New York prison and to contract with the common council of New York for the care and custody of the female convicts, and they were directed to prepare plans for a female prison at Sing Sing to be submitted to the next Legislature. These plans were accordingly made. The Legislature did not make an appropriation, but under the intelligent suggestion of its committee upon that subject, adopted a resolution requiring the commissioners to inquire whether some place could not be found contiguous to a populous village where the female prisoners might have employment and moral instruction and the superintending care of benevolent females. There was much difficulty in relation to the female prison and to the management of female prisoners generally. They were not kept steady at work like the men, and there was little discipline in the prisons where they were confined. They were constantly quarreling and fighting, the air around them was thick with curses, blasphemies and the most revolting and licentious conversation. A woman who had served out her term there was ready for murder or any evil work that the devil could suggest. In 1835 the agent of Sing Sing prison was directed to build a female prison at that place, and all the female prisoners in the State were required to be sent to it as soon as completed. When the prison was ready for the reception of prisoners in 1837 this provision was carried into effect, and it has ever since continued to be the female prison of the State. The mechanics of the State had always looked upon the prisons with an eye of jealousy, and now each year increased their aversion to the employment of the prisoners at trades, which they believed had a tendency to reduce their own wages. The Legislature, as each succeeding year rolled round, added new provisions which they thought might relieve the evil. New trades were introduced into the prisons, different from those carried on in the State. Plantations of mulberry trees were made at the prisons with a view to the manufacture of silk. The officers were prohibited, under severe penalties, from entering into contracts for labor at the prohibited trades, and various other means were ineffectually resorted to to calm the popular excitement. In 1842 the Governor, Secretary of State and Comptroller, were directed to appoint commissioners, who were to inquire whether mining and smelting operations can be carried on upon any of the State lands by the convicts, they were also to inquire into the expense of locating such lands and the expense of building a prison. On the report of these commissioners in 1844 a law was passed establishing such a prison in Clinton county, and its erection was at once commenced by a draft of two hundred of the worst convicts in Sing Sing. They were taken to Dannemora and encamped in the heart of the wilderness, where they built a prison almost wholly by their own unaided labor. This prison was ready for occupation in 1846, and has ever since been principally devoted to the mining of iron ore and the manufacture of iron. On the 1st day of January, 1847, the new Constitution went into effect, by which the whole management of the prisons was committed to a board of three inspectors, one of whom was to be elected annually. The prison association, in the early part of that year, prepared an elaborate code of prison discipline, which was adopted by the Legislature, with three important additions. By the first, the use of the lash was utterly prohibited in all the prisons. By the second, teachers were to be appointed to instruct such prisoners as were uneducated, in reading, writing and arithmetic. By the third, it was made the duty of the inspectors to build twenty cells at Sing Sing, ten at Auburn and five at Clinton, each containing 996 cubic feet of clear space, to be used for the solitary confinement of such prisoners as were habitually disobedient to the rules of the prison, and who could not with safety be kept in association with others. This last provision has been utterly ignored by every successive board of inspectors since that time, to the great damage of the State and the great detriment of the discipline of the prisons. The only important change in the discipline of the prisons, made since the adoption of the Constitution of 1846, has been the re-enactment of the principle of the law of 1817, by which good conduct on the part of the prisoner is made to earn a remission of a part of his sentence. This change was made at the instance of the prison association, earnestly and ably supported by Governor Seymour. The law was enacted in 1863, and, as amended by the act of 1864, it provides that entire good conduct on the part of a prisoner shall earn a remission of one month for each year during the first two years; two months on each succeeding year until the fifth year: three months on each following year until the tenth year, and four months on each succeeding year of the term. No measure ever adopted has worked so much unmixed good as this has done. From this summary statement of the legislation of this State in relation to prisons, it will be seen that its criminals are subject to one uniform and unvarying system, without any thought of individual adaptation. The good and the bad, the old and the young, are mixed together in one mass; the gentle and the froward receive precisely the same amount and kind of punishment. There are no earnest, well-directed efforts to enlighten their ignorance or to stimulate their moral affections. All who enter these walls are compelled to work all day, and be confined in a narrow cell all night. They are allowed to listen to one sermon on Sunday, and those who desire it may spend one hour in the Sabbath school. The only inducement held out to them voluntarily to co-operate in promoting their own reformation, is the law of 1864, to which we have just alluded. This is all there is of the boasted Auburn system. Now, Mr. President, let us pause for a single moment, and ask ourselves the question, whether these simple and unmeaning provisions meet the conditions of the problem which it is our duty to solve. We have some thousands of vigorous, active men, in the prime of life, without principles, ready for any kind of assault upon either property or persons that may be suggested to them; they have been educated by long practice to a high degree of skill in making those assaults successfully and in concealing their participation in them. They know no other kind of life and are unfitted to be successful in any other. We have another large class who do not desire to lead a criminal life, and who would greatly prefer to walk in the paths of honesty, if they could do so; but they are affected with a congenital feebleness of will which unfits them to resist temptations—the moment they are assailed by temptation they fall. Such being the facts, is not our so-called prison system simply ludicrous? How can we expect that keeping men in narrow cells, except when they are engaged in silent and monotonous labor, will make unprincipled men conscientious; will make ignorant men intelligent; will make feeble volitions strong; will help men who do not know how to make an honest living, to become successful in an honest struggle for life. We see at a glance that the remedy has no sort of relation to the disease. That we have no right to expect that this method will either deter others from the commission of crime, or reform those who have been already guilty of it. This point being established, we are under the necessity of inquiring earnestly for a more excellent way. The motto of the sluggard has always been, "What can't be cured must be endured." The earnest statesman has always reversed the idea, and has held "that what can't be endured, must be cured." the system we are in search of must provide, above all things, for teaching the convict how to earn an honest living. This implies a cultivation of the head and heart as well as of the hands. To make a living out of any trade it is as essential for a man to know how to dispose of his wares, as it is to know how to fabricate them. He must learn how to keep accounts, how to judge of the quality of the raw material; where and how he can procure it to the best advantage. Customers are attracted by pleasing manners, as they are repelled by coarse and vulgar conduct. If we expect him to succeed, we must cultivate his manners as much as we train him to manual dexterity. We all know that the intercourse of society is hedged about with irresistible laws; if those laws are obeyed, our relations with society are peaceful and pleasant, if they are violated a penalty is evolved out of every violation, with absolute and unerring certainty. I say, sir, that we know that such is the case, but the criminal knows nothing of the kind; he sees no sequence of cause and effect between the social law that he has violated and the misery of which he is so painfully conscious. Any system which is truly remedial must make the criminal thoroughly acquainted with these social laws, and with the inevitable penalties which God has annexed to their violation. We must show them, through a system of instruction and discipline that they can understand and appreciate, that "honesty is," really and truly, "the best policy," that every violation of the social law
